With Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, the Berlin prima donna, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under the able direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" and "Hungaria," Liszt's symphonic poem, were presented in the usual excellent manner of the noted organization. Mme. van Endert's [illegible] of songs included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," "Wiegenlied," Richard Strauss' "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Es Schankeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice, a pure soprano, is sweet and appealing and furnished rather a surprise to her hearers in the dramatic "Verborgenheit." That she delighted her audience was manifest by the generous applause bestowed.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1914
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strong Modern Programme, With Cesar Franck and Strauss for High Lights.

Had Dr. Muck prepared the programme for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Academy last night, for a town which during the week had been deluged with Beethoven, he could not have chosen its numbers more wisely. His programme was wholly modern, but it was modern music of such strength and beauty that it was impressive even to those who had heard the "Eroica" twice within five days.

The backbone of the programme was Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D Minor," which has been played here recently enough so that auditors could get an added sense of its beauty and power through familiarity. Franck was one of those who helped to lead music back to the symphonic form after raids upon all forms had been made by Wagner and Liszt. In this case he led straight back to Beethoven, whom his work suggests, first of all because Franck had something worth saying and then because he said it with clarity and continence. He uses the chromatic harmonies which had been established by Wagner, but not with the extravagance of a revolutionist or for the sake of sensation. It seems difficult to believe now that the Paris of twenty-five years ago could not make anything out of this symphony, but the public attitude was probably greatly affected by worship of Gounod and by a suspicion that anybody whose music did not sound like Gounod must be a worshiper of the hated Wagner. Certainly, Franck does not sound like Gounod, any more than a great organ in the hands of a master sounds like a couple of thrushes liting from a thicket. But today he does not seem more difficult to enjoy than the thrushes, although far better worth while.

The other big orchestral number was the "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss. Unlike some other of Strauss' symphonic tone pictures the number does not lose its impressiveness by frequent repetition. There is nothing new to be said about this titanic picture of the struggle of man with death. It is so elemental that its hold on the imagination does not relax, however often it may have been heard. The performance last night would have been amazing had audiences not long ago ceased to be amazed when Dr. Muck does almost unheard-of things with his band of virtuosi. The call which brought the men to their feet to acknowledge the applause was richly deserved.

At the close, Dr. Muck played the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," simple, homely, red-blooded music and well calculated to bring the audience down from transcendental clouds and send them home happy with their feet firmly planted on the icy pavements.

The soloist was Elisabeth van Endert, a German singer new here, whose songs were all modern and most of them highly attractive, notably an exquisite "Cradle Song," by Humperdinck, the familiar "Cradle Song" of Strauss and Retirement," by Hugo Wolf. "Strauss' "Caecalie" and D'Albert's "Hymn to Venus" were less successful. Mme. van Endert has a good voice, especially in its lower range, and she sings sympathetically and with excellent phrasing and diction. Some of her upper tones where she pushed her voice for volume were hard, but the sympathetic quality of her singing atoned for defects which it could not conceal.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1914
FL
Date

FIVE SYMPHONIES WITHIN ONE WEEK

Boston Orchestra Third to Be Heard at Academy Since Last Friday.

EXCELS IN FRANCK NUMBER.

Mme. von Endert, of Berlin Opera, Is Soloist.

Housing five symphony concerts within one week is the newest achievement of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is surely a record for this borough, and there is no doubt that it is sufficiently impressive to allow artistic Brooklyn to look the rest of the world square in the eye. Last evening's appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth of the season's series, was the brilliant climax of all of this activity. It followed the young people's concert of the New Symphony, last Saturday after on; the Philharmonic Sunday tinee and the two first events of Damrosch Beethoven festival, nday and Thursday.

he Boston Symphony Orchestra wish for no better fate than to judged by its interpretation and dition of Cesar Franck's symony in D minor, which opened last ning's programme. In apprais the value of this musical organiion's work one cannot get far ugh away from the general faith the belief that it is the best orstra in the country, perhaps in world, and that to criticize it ld be a heresy. But one may pare the recent achievements of Dr. Muck's band, even including the onderful Mozart number of last onth's concert, and the Franck symphony, like Abou Ben Ezra's name, will surely head the rest.

The Bostonians are tone-specialists, just as the Stransky orchestra, heard here Sunday, excels in warmth and snap, as witness the justice done to the Brahms Hungarian dances at that matinee. The Franck symphony has more lilting, moving melodies than the most pretentious Viennese operette; more pleasing harmonies than the Italian or eary Wagnerian opera makers could command, yet with all its abundance of tune rhythm and blending of orchestral voices it forces upon the hearer the consciousness of a master hand at work on the technical problems of the symphony. The third movement combines motives from the first and second with its own new phrases in a way to command admiration for the mere mathematical excellence of the method. Through all of its intricacies run those splendid melodies, particularly one song that recurs in the first and third numbers. The instruments of Dr. Muck's faithful band sang out eloquently in these passages, equally inspiring when the brasses were harmonizing in fortissimo and when strings and harp were being plucked with feathery touch in the scherzo.

Many thought the Strauss number the most important last night. This was the tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." A young woman was added to the ranks of the orchestra, playing a second harp. When occasion came for the two harps to be heard the pair of artists might as well have been pantomimists, for the noise from the brasses was enough to drown six instruments such as theirs. But the tone-poem is a remarkable piece of imagination, and at its close last night the orchestra arose to acknowledge the applause. Its best moments were in the crescendo passages at the close, denoting deliverance and final transfiguration.

The orchestra closed the evening with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." Soloist of the concert was Elisabeth von Endert, from the Berlin Royal Opera, a singer of German lieder. Her selections were a song by Hugo Wolf, two by Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie"; a Humperdinck cradle song and the d'Albert "Hymn to Venus." Some of these selections have been included in Brooklyn concerts by Slezak, Schuman-Heink and others. The d'Albert number was Mme. von Endert's best. She is a young woman of pleasing personality and a winning manner, with a wealth of fresh, clear voice. The audience gave her a warm reception, and her art proved as welcome as any sort of music following closely upon the glorious Franck symphony could be.

The orchestra played last night without the services of its concertmaster, Anton Witek.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City

Date

FUTURIST MUSIC LED BY DR. MUCK

Beethoven and Strauss Making Their Way Slowly Among a Blinded Populace.

WHOLE DAY OF GOOD MUSIC

Calls for Tauscher at Metropolitan in Evening and Russian Opera in the Afternoon.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

New York enjoyed a thoroughly musical Saturday. "Boris Godounoff" was sung at the Metropolitan Opera House in the afternoon and "Die Walkuere" in the evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck and explained with a detail almost Germanic by Dr. Davis Hale, paid its antepenultimate visit to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The word antepenultimate, while perfectly correct, is used in a spirit of egotistical and emulatory raillery to prove to Dr. Philip Hale, who is the musical Porson of the age, that he is only a minor member of an interlocking directorate controlling the raw material of a sesquipedalian vocabulary.

The programme contained three numbers and the house contained every one it could. There is no nonsense of patriotism or parochialism about the New York amateur of music. Apparently his spirit is sufficiently proud, rebellious and Satanic to prefer good music to bad.

The three numbers in question were the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This was done partly in honor of Dr. Alexander Konta.

I suppose it would be incorrect to class the Fifth Symphony and the Strauss poem together as Futurist music. Perhaps "Presentist" would be the correct term, though the present is only a second and the future lasts forever. It may be also incorrect to mention Beethoven and Strauss in the same breath. But they have this in common, that they affect the few, the very few, natural souls that take the trouble to listen to them.

Beethoven and Strauss Linked.

Perhaps, in the future, Beethoven and Strauss will attain a general contemporaneous celebrity equivalent to that of Dr. Jack Johnson, the brumous gladiator, and Dr. Daniel Maher, the eminent competitive equestrian. This is another reason why the epithet "Futurist" may be applied to Beethoven and Dr. Strauss. Dr. Marinetti, the head pilgrim of the Futurists, might discover still another. Society, he might urge, has not yet "taken up" Beethoven. Beacon Hill is still a bit frigid, and Fifth avenue almost indifferent. But think of Dr. Uriel; Dr. Davis Hale has done a doughty and worthy action in publishing Dr. Hector Berlioz's eloquent and imaginative description of the Fifth Symphony.

There has been much braying and twaddling about what painters call "the literature" of the symphony, that is to say, its influence on the emotions and imaginative, rather than its purely musical construction and aesthetics. One genius discovered in a characteristic phrase the notes of the oriole. He would have found frogs in "Hamlet." I reproduce some of the remarks of Dr. Berlioz, because it is always attractive and valuable to read the opinion of one artist upon another. Moreover Dr. Berlioz was what very few musicians have been—a man of cultivated intellect and wide reading. The leisure hours of his boyhood were passed in reading Virgil; his early manhood in studying Shakespeare, and his riper years in quarreling with an Irish actress. Nothing is so broadening.

Read What Dr. Berlioz Sayeth.

Here it is: "The first movement is devoted to the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul, a prey to despair; not the concentrated, calm despair that borrows the shape of resignation; not the dark and voiceless sorrow of Romeo who learns the death of Juliet, but the terrible rage of Othello when he receives from Iago's mouth the poisonous slanders which persuade him of Desdemona's guilt. Now it is a frenetic delirium which explodes in frightful cries; and now it is the prostration that has only accents of regret and profound self-pity."

Dr. Muck's interpretation was excellent, though we have heard the last movement played with more fire—and by himself. The stormy, sullen and painful scenes of "Death and Transfiguration" were energetically rendered, and it is difficult to understand why the Pastists were unable to recognize its genius when it was first played. Perhaps it was because their brains were full of oratorios and cheese mites.

From TRIBUNE

"Boris" Powerful and Picturesque.

There is little left to be said of the Russian opera "Boris Godounoff" save that it is one of the most powerful, picturesque and new-sensed operas we have had in years. The choruses are the vertebrae of the work, and they were rendered with amazing spirit. M. Gatti-Casazza and M. Toscanini have had more success in mounting it than most operatic managers have had in spelling it.

"Die Walkuere" was given in the evening with Madame Gadski, the undoubted Ring-mistress; Mme. Olive Fremstad, M. Carl Joern, M. Weil and Mr. Ruysdael. Dr. Alfred Hertz conducted. The enthusiasm at the end of the second expressed itself in loud calls for "Dr. Tauscher."

IERALD
Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 8 1914

MUSIC LOVERS HEAR BRILLIANT CONCER

Boston Symphony Orchestra Giv Fourth Program of Season at New National Theater.

MME. VAN ENDERT SOLOIST

Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was the chief orchestral piece of the concert—the fourth of the season—given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, fresh from her triumphs in Berlin, was the soloist.

Of the Schubert Company, the adorable beauty of whose thematic riches everybody knows, it need only be said that this work received yesterday the highest possible presentation. Dr. Muck is the high priest of pure music, of the ideally beautiful in music, that connotes no definite dramatic action. No one ever made the instruments of the orchestra discourse more eloquently of the mystery and the deep inmost significance of the ideal tone world.

This was to be felt also in Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous ~~Voyage."~~ Chiefly through the subtle management of the inner voices, the atmosphere of fateful calm was given, as well as the psychological impression of helplessness. In the latter part of the composition, the realistic devices, the arrival safely in port, were not strongly insisted upon. Dr. Muck always maintains a high plane of interpretations, rarely lending himself to graphic musical description.

The Liszt Symphonic Poem, "Hungaria," is an extremely interesting work, to which Dr. Muck has given the most careful study. A great deal of it is not musical thematically and dissonances abound throughout; rhythmic changes are frequent. The use of unusual instruments in solo passages and of unusual combinations of instruments makes it an instructive study in instrumentation. It is a most brillian piece and useful at the end of a program for the revival of flagging interest.

Mme. van Endert sang Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," the "Wiegenlied," and "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss; "E Schankeln die Winds" of Humperdinck and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice is a clear, beautiful soprano, of sufficient vocal power, but of not extraordinary emotional range. Such songs as she sang yesterday are a severe test of emotional power and depth of tonal portrayal. Of these songs her best work was done in the Humperdinck song and in Strauss' "Wiegenlied." The deep intuitional sense and the dramatic power combined, necessary to a powerful rendering of Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" is rare, and Mme. van Endert gave that song as powerful an interpretation as one hears from any but the greatest of the great lieder singers. She is youthful, and maturity will doubtless bring with it dramatic power and richness of conception.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn FEB 2

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CO

Strong Modern Programme, sar Franck and Strauss High Lights.

Had Dr. Muck prepared the for the fourth concert of t Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Academy last night, for a town which during the week had been deluged with Beethoven, he could not have chosen its numbers more wisely. His programme was wholly modern, but it was modern music of such strength and beauty that it was impressive even to those who had heard the "Eroica" twice within five days.

The backbone of the programme was Cesar Franck's "Symphony in D Minor," which has been played here recently enough so that auditors could get an added sense of its beauty and power through familiarity. Franck was one of those who helped to lead music back to the symphonic form after raids upon all forms had been made by Wagner and Liszt. In this case he led straight back to Beethoven, whom his work suggests, first of all because Franck had something worth saying and then because he said it with clarity and continence. He uses the chromatic harmonies which had been established by Wagner, but not with the extravagance of a revolutionist or for the sake of sensation. It seems difficult to believe now that the Paris of twenty-five years ago could not make anything out of this symphony, but the public attitude was probably greatly affected by worship of Gounod and by a suspicion that anybody whose music did not sound like Gounod must be a worshiper of the hated Wagner. Certainly, Franck does not sound like Gounod, any more than a great organ in the hands of a master sounds like a couple of thrushes lilting from a thicket. But today he does not seem more difficult to enjoy than the thrushes, although far better worth while.

The other big orchestral number was the "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss. Unlike some other of Strauss' symphonic tone pictures the number does not lose its impressiveness by frequent repetition. There is nothing new to be said about this titanic picture of the struggle of man with death. It is so elemental that its hold on the imagination does not relax, however often it may have been heard. The performance last night would have been amazing had audiences not long ago ceased to be amazed when Dr. Muck does almost unheard-of things with his band of virtuosi. The call which brought the men to their feet to acknowledge the applause was richly deserved.

At the close. Dr. Muck played the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," simple, homely, red-blooded music and well calculated to bring the audience down from transcendental clouds and send them home happy with their feet firmly planted on the icy pavements.

The soloist was Elisabeth van Endert, a German singer new here, whose songs were all modern and most of them highly attractive, notably an exquisite "Cradle Song," by Humperdinck, the familiar "Cradle Song" of Strauss and "Retirement," by Hugo Wolf. Strauss' "Caecilie" and D'Albert's "Hymn to Venus" were less successful. Mme. van Endert has a good voice, especially in its lower range, and she sings sympathetically and with excellent phrasing and diction. Some of her upper tones where she pushed her voice for volume were hard, but the sympathetic quality of her singing atoned for defects which it could not conceal.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 8 1914

Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

With Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, the Berlin prima donna, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, under the able direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage" and "Hungaria," Liszt's symphonic poem, were presented in the usual excellent manner of the noted organization. Mme. van Endert's [illegible] of songs included Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," "Wiegenlied," Richard Strauss' "Caecilie," Humperdinck's "Es Schankeln die Winde" and d'Albert's "Hymn to Venus." Her voice, a pure soprano, is sweet and appealing and furnished rather a surprise to her hearers in the dramatic "Verborgenheit." That she delighted her audience was manifest by the generous applause bestowed.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1914
FL

Date

FIVE SYMPHONIES WITHIN ONE WEEK

Boston Orchestra Third to Be Heard at Academy Since Last Friday.

EXCELS IN FRANCK NUMBER.

Mme. von Endert, of Berlin Opera, Is Soloist.

Housing five symphony concerts within one week is the newest achievement of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is surely a record for this borough, and there is no doubt that it is sufficiently impressive to allow artistic Brooklyn to look the rest of the world square in the eye. Last evening's appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the fourth of the season's series, was the brilliant climax of all of this activity. It followed the young people's concert of the New York Symphony, last Saturday afternoon; the Philharmonic Sunday matinee and the two first events of the Damrosch Beethoven festival, Monday and Thursday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra can wish for no better fate than to be judged by its interpretation and rendition of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which opened last evening's programme. In appraising the value of this musical organization's work one cannot get far enough away from the general faith in the belief that it is the best orchestra in the country, perhaps in the world, and that to criticize it would be a heresy. But one may compare the recent achievements of Dr. Muck's band, even including the wonderful Mozart number of last month's concert, and the Franck symphony, like Abou Ben Ezra's name, will surely head the rest.

The Bostonians are tone-specialists, just as the Stransky orchestra, heard here Sunday, excels in warmth and snap, as witness the justice done to the Brahms Hungarian dances at that matinee. The Franck symphony has more lilting, moving melodies than the most pretentious Viennese operette; more pleasing harmonies than the Italian or eary Wagnerian opera makers could command, yet with all its abundance of tune rhythm and blending of orchestral voices it forces upon the hearer the consciousness of a master hand at work on the technical problems of the symphony. The third movement combines motives from the first and second with its own new phrases in a way to command admiration for the mere mathematical excellence of the method. Through all of its intricacies run those splendid melodies, particularly one song that recurs in the first and third numbers. The instruments of Dr. Muck's faithful band sang out eloquently in these passages, equally inspiring when the brasses were harmonizing in fortissimo and when strings and harp were being plucked with feathery touch in the scherzo.

Many thought the Strauss number the most important last night. This was the tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." A young woman was added to the ranks of the orchestra, playing a second harp. When occasion came for the two harps to be heard the pair of artists might as well have been pantomimists, for the noise from the brasses was enough to drown six instruments such as theirs. But the tone-poem is a remarkable piece of imagination, and at its close last night the orchestra arose to acknowledge the applause. Its best moments were in the crescendo passages at the close, denoting deliverance and final transfiguration.

The orchestra closed the evening with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride." Soloist of the concert was Elisabeth von Endert, from the Berlin Royal Opera, a singer of German lieder. Her selections were a song by Hugo Wolf, two by Strauss, "Wiegenlied" and "Cacilie"; a Humperdinck cradle song and the d'Albert "Hymn to Venus." Some of these selections have been included in Brooklyn concerts by Slezak, Schuman-Heink and others. The d'Albert number was Mme. von Endert's best. She is a young woman of pleasing personality and a winning manner, with a wealth of fresh, clear voice. The audience gave her a warm reception, and her art proved as welcome as any sort of music following closely upon the glorious Franck symphony could be.

The orchestra played last night without the services of its concert master, Anton Witek.

[127]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From TIMES
Address: New York City
FEB 22 1914
Date

rk, 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Beethoven, Strauss, and Liszt.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's afternoon concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall included no soloist, and only three numbers—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Strauss's symphonic poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This last was represented upon the programme as played then for the first time in New York.

The fact that Mr. Hale—if it was Mr. Hale—so inscribed it is in itself good reason for believing that it may be true; but it is hard to suppose that in the fifty-five years since the first of Liszt's symphonic poems was played in New York this one should have been omitted from their programmes by the several conductors who have played so much other modern music here—Bergmann, Thomas, Seidl, Van der Stucken, and others.

The point is not of great importance; "Hungaria" is one of the thinnest and emptiest of the group, one of the most fragmentary in its thematic structure and development, poor and noisy in its orchestration. Parts of it, indeed, sound almost like a parody upon Liszt's orchestral procedures. Dr. Muck and his men worked zealously over it, but even their efforts could not make it sound consequential or important.

Their performance of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" was superb. It has, perhaps, never been made so clear, so splendidly sonorous, so moving, nor given so great a cohesiveness or artistic unity. It was filled with passion and pathos; and certainly all of the tragic spirit that Strauss put into the music was proclaimed in this interpretation. The work was raised to the highest power of expression.

The performance deeply stirred the audience, and the applause was such that Dr. Muck, after several times bowing himself, made his men rise and bow with him. There was also a notably fine performance of the symphony; not one that disclosed beauties hitherto unsuspected, but that truly disclosed Beethoven's inspiration and truly interpreted it, without exaggeration and without a seeking for effects not belonging to the music.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date

Esta
4

MUCK'S BOSTON MUSICIANS SCORE

Carnegie Hall Crowded to Hear Symphony Orchestra Give Beethoven Concert.

Those fortunate enough to be at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard one of the most beautiful performances of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that New York has listened to in years. The fortunate ones were as many as Carnegie Hall could hold, and several hundreds were turned away. When it is added that there was no popular assisting artist, but only three orchestral numbers to the programme, the esteem in which the Bostonian visitors are held appears amply evident. Whatever mistrust there may be between the two cities disappears when Major Higginson's famous band is the stake at issue; to Major Higginson all America owes a debt of the deepest gratitude.

Dr. Muck's reading of the great symphony was all and more than was to be expected from a conductor so sympathetic with the master's work. It was a reading unmarred by any exaggeration of dynamics, noble in contour, broad in spirit, yet with a nicety of detail which was well-nigh perfect. Needless to say, the tone of the orchestra was supremely rich and resonant. The Scherzo received a particularly exquisite performance, its sombre, mysterious poetry being wonderfully brought forth.

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" was the second number, and here again Dr. Muck threw himself into his work with herculean energy, with the result that the tone poem has rarely received as brilliant a performance, and the delighted hearers must have wondered why a composer who could write such superbly beautiful music should have later strayed so far along bypaths strewn with the dead leaves of cacophony.

Unfortunately, Dr. Muck chose for the last number of the afternoon a symphonic poem by Liszt, of which the only apparent raison d'être for its production lay in the fact that it is supposed never before to have been played in New York. It is at least to be hoped that it will never be played again. It was called "Hungaria," but despite its Hungarian rhythms it proved an empty, long drawn out, altogether uninspired composition. The reason for its long deferred performance was manifest in every bar.

of 1839 found.

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date

k, 1884

1884

Boston Players Charm Hearers at Concert

Symphony Orchestra Gives Fourth Matinee of Season at Carnegie Hall —Plays Without Soloist.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra played its fourth matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience. There was no soloist, but this did not in the least affect the attendance, proving that the orchestra is a soloist in itself.

Dr. Muck conducted in a programme of reasonable length and good proportions, beginning with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which was played with classic refinement and yet charged with compelling beauty. Dr. Muck's interpretation was free of freakish exaggerations and devoid of sensational effects but it was alive with interest, the playing revealing the full dramatic value of the opening movement, the lyric beauty of the andante, the humor of the scherzo and the triumphant quality of the finale. There was much applause following the beautiful performance.

Then came Dr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," the beginning of which sounded a bit too refined and unemotional to portray the struggle against death of a fever patient. But the finale, the "Transfiguration" section, was played beautifully, the climax being overpowering in its dynamic force. The concluding number was Liszt's symphonic poem "Hungaria," which, though brilliant, is scarcely a great, representative writing of this composer. Applause followed its [illegible]clusion, and then these "Boston [illegible]ves" packed their instruments and [illegible]rted back for their native heath, [illegible]ing music lovers of New York the [illegible]pier for having heard the concert.

From POST
Address: New York
FEB 23 1914
Date

E 1884

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Music.

For musical epicures the most enjoyable of the many performances of the past two days were the "Walküre" at the Metropolitan, on Saturday night; the playing of Liszt's "Hungaria" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon, and Grieg's piano concerto, as played yesterday afternoon by Teresa Carreño and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Both Gadski and Fremstad delighted their admirers in the Wagner opera. The chief drawback was the excessive length of the performance, for which Mr. Hertz is to blame. He is also to blame for the fact that the chorus of Valkyries, all of them singing at the top of their voices, could hardly be heard amid the terrific orchestral din. There ought to be some way of making operatic conductors understand that they are not the whole show.

Dr. Muck, who is, like all the great orchestral conductors of the time, an ardent admirer of the works of Liszt, deserves special thanks for putting on his programme the ninth of his symphonic poems, heretofore strangely neglected in this city. While less rich in thematic material than "Tasso" and "Les Préludes," and less stirring than "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," it has charms of its own which ought to insure it frequent hearing. Liszt himself evidently liked it, for he twice revised it, the last time in 1856. That was nearly sixty years ago, yet the music sounds as fresh and up-to-date as if it had been composed by Strauss or Debussy. That is the marvel of genius. The orchestration is as rich and varied as Wagner's, and it is a delight to drink in such music, improvised, as it were, unmarred by the traditional fetters of artificial form, yet always coherent. The first entry of the brass choir is thrilling, and the second hardly less so. The 'cello delivers an interesting speech, while the violin solo in gypsy fashion is delightful. On the whole, the Hungarian element is less conspicuous than in the rhapsodies, but it asserts itself more and more toward the end, and one can easily understand that when Liszt himself conducted this work at the Hungarian National Theatre, in 1856, he was able to write afterwards: "'Les Préludes' had to be played twice, for the applause was without end; as for 'Hungaria,' there was something better than applause; men and women wept." Liszt himself con [illegible] dly conducted [illegible] nation

[128]

From Press
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 22 1914

Est
1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's Players Give Great Performance of Beethoven's Fifth.

Just as Brahms's Fourth Symphony was the high-water mark of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Thursday evening, so Beethoven's Fifth gave the keenest pleasure at the matinee of Dr. Karl Muck and his band of virtuosi yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

A more satisfying interpretation of that immortal work than the great conductor gave would be difficult to imagine, for the performance—technically impeccable, of course combined classic dignity and simplicity with emotional vitality and poetic refinement.

Beautifully, too, the men from the Hub played Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

In a measure, to be sure, the leader sacrificed sentiment for clarity of exposition, pathos for brilliancy of execution. Nevertheless his reading seemed a revelation after the one given recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowsky.

The concert closed with a stirring performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," one of the least familiar compositions of the famous pianist-composer.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 21 1914
Date

Establ
4

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

In Finely-Varied Programme, Mme. Van Endert, Soloist, Pleases.

A programme which offered delightful variety while obviously conserving a basic idea in its arrangement was that offered at Boston Symphony concert at the fourth of the Brooklyn series. Caesar Franck's Symphony in D major was the first number, played with consummate artistry by the famous orchestra. Dr. Muck's reading was sympathetic as well as masterly. The infinite variety of nuance, perfect rythm and color imparted to it were matters for rejoicing. Especially enchanting was the Allegretto, the very perfection of ensemble playing, with pianissimo passages of incredible delicacy and ethereal quality. The finale was a brilliant achievement.

A most noble and moving performance was that of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," rarely beautiful and uplifting, stirring the audience to the greatest enthusiasm. Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, the soloist of the evening, who comes to this country with an assurred reputation as an operatic singer in Germany, was heard in two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group embraced Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." The second group included Humberdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and Eugen d'Albert's anangent of the mediaeval Hymn to Venus from Rudolph Lothar's comedy, "The Queen of Cyprus."

Mme. van Endert's voice is full-dramatic soprano, distinctly more pleasing in its higher register than in its lower. A voice which she uses with excellent effect in certain passages which are essentially those of the operatic singer. In the rendition of the lieder she disclosed intelligence and feeling, although her gifts as interpreter are not superlative they are agreeable. Wolf's lovely song was sung with taste and not without sympathy, although neither in this nor in the "Caecilie" did the singer disclose unusual or distinctive individuality. The Humperdinck number was sung with an engaging simplicity, sweetness and charm; the concluding number with dramatic breadth and dignity. Mme. van Endert's is an attractive personality.

The programme concluded with a vigorous and dashing performance of Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," which by the way is much more euphoniously if not so literally rendered by the familiar "Bartered Bride."

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date FEB 22 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Beethoven, Strauss, and Liszt.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's afternoon concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall included no soloist, and only three numbers—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Strauss's symphonic poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." This last was represented upon the programme as played then for the first time in New York.

The fact that Mr. Hale—if it was Mr. Hale—so inscribed it is in itself good reason for believing that it may be true; but it is hard to suppose that in the fifty-five years since the first of Liszt's symphonic poems was played in New York this one should have been omitted from their programmes by the several conductors who have played so much other modern music here—Bergmann, Thomas, Seidl, Van der Stucken, and others.

The point is not of great importance; "Hungaria" is one of the thinnest and emptiest of the group, one of the most fragmentary in its thematic structure and development, poor and noisy in its orchestration. Parts of it, indeed, sound almost like a parody upon Liszt's orchestral procedures. Dr. Muck and his men worked zealously over it, but even their efforts could not make it sound consequential or important.

Their performance of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" was superb. It has, perhaps, never been made so clear, so splendidly sonorous, so moving, nor given so great a cohesiveness or artistic unity. It was filled with passion and pathos; and certainly all of the tragic spirit that Strauss put into the music was proclaimed in this interpretation. The work was raised to the highest power of expression.

The performance deeply stirred the audience, and the applause was such that Dr. Muck, after several times bowing himself, made his men rise and bow with him. There was also a notably fine performance of the symphony; not one that disclosed beauties hitherto unsuspected, but that truly disclosed Beethoven's inspiration and truly interpreted it, without exaggeration and without a seeking for effects not belonging to the music.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date FEB [illegible]

MUCK'S BOSTON MUSICIANS SCO

Carnegie Hall Crowded to H Symphony Orchestra Give Beethoven Concert.

Those fortunate enough to be at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra heard one of the most beautiful performances of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that New York has listened to in years. The fortunate ones were as many as Carnegie Hall could hold, and several hundreds were turned away. When it is added that there was no popular assisting artist, but only three orchestral numbers to the programme, the esteem in which the Bostonian visitors are held appears amply evident. Whatever mistrust there may be between the two cities disappears when Major Higginson's famous band is the stake at issue; to Major Higginson all America owes a debt of the deepest gratitude.

Dr. Muck's reading of the great symphony was all and more than was to be expected from a conductor so sympathetic with the master's work. It was a reading unmarred by any exaggeration of dynamics, noble in contour, broad in spirit, yet with a nicety of detail which was well-nigh perfect. Needless to say, the tone of the orchestra was supremely rich and resonant. The Scherzo received a particularly exquisite performance, its sombre, mysterious poetry being wonderfully brought forth.

Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" was the second number, and here again Dr. Muck threw himself into his work with herculean energy, with the result that the tone poem has rarely received as brilliant a performance, and the delighted hearers must have wondered why a composer who could write such superbly beautiful music should have later strayed so far along bypaths strewn with the dead leaves of cacophony.

Unfortunately, Dr. Muck chose for the last number of the afternoon a symphonic poem by Liszt, of which the only apparent raison d'être for its production lay in the fact that it is supposed never before to have been played in New York. It is at least to be hoped that it will never be played again. It was called "Hungaria," but despite its Hungarian rhythms it proved an empty, long drawn out, altogether uninspired composition. The reason for its long deferred performance was manifest in every bar.

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date

Boston Players Charm Hearers at Concert

Symphony Orchestra Gives Fourth Matinee of Season at Carnegie Hall —Plays Without Soloist.

Boston's Symphony Orchestra played its fourth matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon before a large audience. There was no soloist, but this did not in the least affect the attendance, proving that the orchestra is a soloist in itself.

Dr. Muck conducted in a programme of reasonable length and good proportions, beginning with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which was played with classic refinement and yet charged with compelling beauty. Dr. Muck's interpretation was free of freakish exaggerations and devoid of sensational effects but it was alive with interest, the playing revealing the full dramatic value of the opening movement, the lyric beauty of the andante, the humor of the scherzo and the triumphant quality of the finale. There was much applause following the beautiful performance.

Then came Dr. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," the beginning of which sounded a bit too refined and unemotional to portray the struggle against death of a fever patient. But the finale, the "Transfiguration" section, was played beautifully, the climax being overpowering in its dynamic force. The concluding number was Liszt's symphonic poem "Hungaria," which, though brilliant, is scarcely a great, representative writing of this composer. Applause followed its conclusion, and then these "Boston braves" packed their instruments and started back for their native heath leaving music lovers of New York the happier for having heard the concert.

From POST
Address: New York
Date FEB 23 19[illegible]

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Saturday and Sunday Music.

For musical epicures the most enjoyable of the many performances of the past two days were the "Walküre" at the Metropolitan, on Saturday night; the playing of Liszt's "Hungaria" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon, and Grieg's piano concerto, as played yesterday afternoon by Teresa Carreño and the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Both Gadski and Fremstad delighted their admirers in the Wagner opera. The chief drawback was the excessive length of the performance, for which Mr. Hertz is to blame. He is also to blame for the fact that the chorus of Valkyries, all of them singing at the top of their voices, could hardly be heard amid the terrific orchestral din. There ought to be some way of making operatic conductors understand that they are not the whole show.

Dr. Muck, who is, like all the great orchestral conductors of the time, an ardent admirer of the works of Liszt, deserves special thanks for putting on his programme the ninth of his symphonic poems, heretofore strangely neglected in this city. While less rich in thematic material than "Tasso" and "Les Préludes," and less stirring than "Mazeppa" and "The Battle of the Huns," it has charms of its own which ought to insure it frequent hearing. Liszt himself evidently liked it, for he twice revised it, the last time in 1856. That was nearly sixty years ago, yet the music sounds as fresh and up-to-date as if it had been composed by Strauss or Debussy. That is the marvel of genius. The orchestration is as rich and varied as Wagner's, and it is a delight to drink in such music, improvised, as it were, unmarred by the traditional fetters of artificial form, yet always coherent. The first entry of the brass choir is thrilling, and the second hardly less so. The 'cello delivers an interesting speech, while the violin solo in gypsy fashion is delightful. On the whole, the Hungarian element is less conspicuous than in the rhapsodies, but it asserts itself more and more toward the end, and one can easily understand that when Liszt himself conducted this work at the Hungarian National Theatre, in 1856, he was able to write afterwards: "'Les Préludes' had to be played twice, for the applause was without end; as for 'Hungaria,' there was something better than applause; men and women wept." Liszt himself could [illegible] conducted [illegible]

From Press
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 22 191[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Muck's Players Give Great Performance of Beethoven's Fifth.

Just as Brahms's Fourth Symphony was the high-water mark of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Thursday evening, so Beethoven's Fifth gave the keenest pleasure at the matinee of Dr. Karl Muck and his band of virtuosi yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

A more satisfying interpretation of that immortal work than the great conductor gave would be difficult to imagine, for the performance—technically impeccable, of course combined classic dignity and simplicity with emotional vitality and poetic refinement.

Beautifully, too, the men from the Hub played Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

In a measure, to be sure, the leader sacrificed sentiment for clarity of exposition, pathos for brilliancy of execution. Nevertheless his reading seemed a revelation after the one given recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowsky.

The concert closed with a stirring performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," one of the least familiar compositions of the famous pianist-composer.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date EB 21 19[illegible]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

In Finely-Varied Programme, Mme. Van Endert, Soloist, Pleases.

A programme which offered delightful variety while obviously conserving a basic idea in its anangement was that offered at Boston Symphony concert at the fourth of the Brooklyn series. Caesar Franck's Symphony in D major was the first number, played with consummate artistry by the famous orchestra. Dr. Muck's reading was sympathetic as well as masterly. The infinite variety of nuance, perfect rythm and color imparted to it were matters for rejoicing. Especially enchanting was the Allegretto, the very perfection of ensemble playing, with pianissimo passages of incredible delicacy and ethereal quality. The finale was a brilliant achievement.

A most noble and moving performance was that of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," rarely beautiful and uplifting, stirring the audience to the greatest enthusiasm. Mme. Elizabeth van Endert, the soloist of the evening, who comes to this country with an assurred reputation as an operatic singer in Germany, was heard in two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group embraced Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Strauss' "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie." The second group included Humberdinck's "Es Schaukeln die Winde," and Eugen d'Albert's anangent of the mediaeval Hymn to Venus from Rudolph Lothar's comedy, "The Queen of Cyprus."

Mme. van Endert's voice is full-dramatic soprano, distinctly more pleasing in its higher register than in its lower. A voice which she uses with excellent effect in certain passages which are essentially those of the operatic singer. In the rendition of the lieder she disclosed intelligence and feeling, although her gifts as interpreter are not superlative they are agreeable. Wolf's lovely song was sung with taste and not without sympathy, although neither in this nor in the "Caecilie" did the singer disclose unusual or distinctive individuality. The Humperdinck number was sung with an engaging simplicity, sweetness and charm; the concluding number with dramatic breadth and dignity. Mme. van Endert's is an attractive personality.

The programme concluded with a vigorous and dashing performance of Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," which by the way is much more euphoniously if not so literally rendered by the familiar "Bartered Bride."

[128]

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date
Established: 1884

Liszt, Beethoven and Strauss on the Programme.

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Carnegie Hall was attended by a typical audience which seemed to be much interested in the first two numbers and somewhat at a loss to know just what to make of the final one. The programme was wholly orchestral. The three compositions were Beethoven's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

Weingartner, always original and fascinating in his comments, declared that "Hungaria" was a masterpiece. Doubtless those to whom the name of Liszt is holy will agree with the eminent conductor. But nevertheless the scoffers will continue to scoff. To them this composition, like several others of Liszt's, is an empty and meaningless repetition of phrases without special significance or beauty in themselves. The piece is admirably instrumented and should furnish further support, if any were needed, for the contention that Liszt contributed almost as much as Berlioz, perhaps quite as much, to the development of modern orchestration.

The performance of the music served to give the orchestra scope for a display of tonal splendors, and incidentally the concertmeister, Anton Witek, for a gypsy cadenza played in true spirit. The Beethoven symphony was performed with immense vigor and incisiveness of style, but without question there were moments when the balance of the orchestra was destroyed by the preponderance of the brass. Dr. Muck is fond of big fortes, and so are most men with blood in their veins, but there is a way to get them without oversetting the harmonic structure.

In the Strauss composition Dr. Muck demonstrated that he was not always affected by emotional yearnings for mere trombones. His reading was beautiful in fluency, clarity, balance and exquisite treatment of the dynamic developments of the work. We have heard the composition interpreted with greater passion, but never with a finer appreciation of its opulent instrumental beauties.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
FEB 22 1914
Date
Established: 1884

THEATER und MUSIK

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das geſtrige Nachmittagskonzert der Boſtoner Gäſte in Carnegie Hall verlief in glänzender Weiſe. Dr. Muck bot eine ungemein großzügige und intereſſante Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Fünfter Symphonie, die ſein herrliches Orcheſter in beſtem Lichte zeigte. Er dirigirte ferner „Tod und Verklärung" von Richard Strauß, welches Werk er in ſtellenweiſe reichlich langſamem Zeitmaß ungemein klar und lichtvoll auslegte. Namentlich am Schluß konnte man ſich einer wirklichen Rührung nicht enthalten. Liszt's „Hungaria" halte ich für das ſchwächſte Orcheſterwerk des großen Weimarer Meiſters, und nicht einmal das wundervolle Spiel der Boſtoner konnte mir das Stück ſympathiſcher machen. Es war ein im Ganzen überaus genußvolles Konzert, das keinen Soliſten brachte. Ob die Zeit kommen wird, da man ſolche Lockmittel auf das große Publikum gänzlich verſchmähen wird? Der Saal war geſtern gänzlich ausverkauft, die Stimmung war

H.

Newspaper Cutting

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
FEB 22 1914
Date
Established:

BEETHOVEN AND STRAUSS PLAYED BY BOSTONIANS

By CHARLES HENRY

Beethoven is being dis again. Our conductors ing honor to him in schemes. Yesterday a concert of the Boston chestra, he led the prog impeccable fifth sympho —the work which is b the most characteristi esque he ever wrote.

After the symphony, terday put the "Death ration," of Strauss, w with the most scrup conscience. To say th derful tone-poem Strauss has succeeded in fully expressing the material and the mystical intentions of the title attached to it would be untruthful. But he has put anguish and terror, joy and gloom and transcendental glory into his music. What we might make of it without the programme notes, heaven only knows. Perhaps something of its mystery might be plain, though, even were no explanation of it set down in cold print.

The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." As has always been the case for some years past at the performances of the Boston orchestra, the huge Carnegie Hall auditorium was filled, from floor to ceiling.

While they played symphony at Carnegie Hall, at the Metropolitan a large audience was enjoying another admirable performance of a Russian masterpiece, "Boris Godounow," sung in Italian by a cast including Didur in the title part, Margarete Ober as Marina, Rothier as Pimenn, and other well known artists. Maestro Toscanini conducted.

The "popular" opera last night at the Metropolitan was "Die Walkuere,"

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
FEB 23 1914
Date
Established: 1884

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS OF THE WEEK-END

There was variety and to spare in the concerts of orchestral music offered to New York music lovers on Saturday and Sunday. Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchtstra, at Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon, offered Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Liszt. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, at Aeolian Hall, yesterday afternoon, provided a programme exclusively of the music of Johannes Brahms and Josef Stransky, and the Philharmonic Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, at the same time selected for its audience's entertainment a diversity of musical fare from Gretry to Schubert and the Frenchman, Charpentier.

Dr. Muck's work of brilliant clarity in exposition of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms was followed by a similar treatment of Beethoven's great C minor symphony. This Fifth Symphony has no angles of novelty; it is possibly the best known symphonic work in the entire orchestral repertoire from Haydn down to the Russians of the minute. Nevertheless, there are still many manners and many styles of playing it, but of them all the best is the manner and the style that best reveals Beethoven.

This was the manner and the style in which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra deliberated themselves of this monument to Beethoven's lasting memory. Nor is this by any means the easiest or the simplest way of playing. Such interpretation means that significance, and the just significance, must be given to every phrase and every accent, every clarifying variation of dynamics and every interpretative shade of orchestral color. And this is what was accomplished.

Strauss's "Tod un Verklaerung," which followed the Beethoven work, is the sort of literary music the penetration of which presents little or no difficulty to a conductor such as Dr. Muck. It was played with brilliance, but neither virtuosity nor musicianship can wrap flesh around its bare, illustrative bones.

programme of the New York

From HERALD
Address: New York City.
Date

r. Karl Muck Laments Paucit of Modern Music

"MUSICAL composition is in a state of stagnation everywhere," said Dr. Karl Muck, the tall, slim conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose readings of Beethoven and Brahms are as near perfection as any that America has been privileged to hear and whose judgment in selecting what is best in present day novelties is on a par with his conducting of the classics.

No orchestra is more popular in this city than that which comes from Boston for ten concerts every year, and much of the prestige is due to the quiet, earnest conductor, who combines in a remarkable degree a profound musical knowledge with the ability to get all that can be had from his players.

"At least in the realm of pure music," ~~he added~~, "there seems to be a sort of 'let up' in the production of masterpieces. There are men of real greatness who are still alive, but they have for the most part said about all that they ever will say. Of course, there are many young men of promise who may arrive some day, but the present output is small.

"The most striking example of a man who apparently has used up all his ideas is Claude Debussy. He has done great service to the cause of music in his original use of the whole tone scale, and, in fact, has so many imitators that his ideas are responsible for almost the whole modern school in France. His earlier works were exquisite, although somewhat limited in scope, but he seems to have used up all the possibilities of his method and seems incapable of expanding.

"Ravel, whose suite, 'Ma Mere l'Oye,' was played at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an imitator of Debussy, who has been able to put enough that is new and that is his own into his writing to make it extremely interesting. There are instrumental affects in the score of 'Ma Mere l'Oye' so original and so cleverly placed that the most experienced ear often cannot tell from what instruments they are produced. But Ravel also writes in a limited field.

* * *

"THEN there are Dukas and Ducasse, who are writers of talent and followers of Debussy who can instil something of themselves into their works. But of all the French composers Florent Schmitt seems to be the most distinctive. He is not a follower of Debussy or any one else in particular. He can write in the delicate style of the others in the French school, but in addition he has the power to write music that is large, that grips with its intensity in a most effective manner.

many little of consequence is mphonic com-

Strauss did in the "Festival Prelude," which we played this year and which showed many traces of being a made to order composition.

"Schoenberg is impossible. His harmonies have no relation to the generally accepted rules and it is a wonder to me how his works can evoke any applause. I can find no system in his writings—that is, in his latest ones—the quartet which the Flonzaley Quartet played is not in his worst vein—and I do not expect to attempt to play anything of his. The boy Krongold is a real wonder and gives promise of becoming a real master when he grows up.

* * *

"In Russia conditions are almost identical. Rachmaninoff has to his credit his great orchestral work which was written many years ago, his symphony No. 2, which we played in Boston this year. Scriabine has invented a new scale system 'à la Debussy,' but it proved insufficient even for his own needs, as it bound him to narrow limits."

"HOW about Elgar and his new symphonic poem 'Falstaff?'"

Dr. Muck threw up his hands.

"We were offered the opportunity to have the first performance in America, but did not want it. There are, however, some interesting things being written in England and I performed a work of Holbrook recently with much satisfaction."

"The inevitable question had to come. 'Do you find that American music possesses signs of greatness?'"

"I will produce soon in Boston a work by a local musician named Clapp—a work of large proportions and excellently written. George Chadwick, another resident of Boston, possesses much talent and I have been considering using one of his orchestral works at the next series of concerts in New York. I also have found interesting qualities in the earlier works of Henry Hadley, who has an almost too facile pen, and also of several others.

* * *

"I HAVE found a peculiar condition in musical tastes in New York, which can be explained easily enough when the cosmopolitan character of the population is taken into consideration. In the hundreds of letters which I receive requesting that certain numbers be played in the concerts here I find that scarcely two of them are alike. One wants more novelties, another wants none at all, and in the end I have to arrange the programmes in my own way without reference to the requests.

"In Boston they like novelties if they happen to be French. Boston has gone mad over French art in music, painting, sculpture and everything else. It seems queer that the one city in America which has retained its old rigid Puritan character more than any other should go to the extreme of getting its art from Paris."

From EVENING SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 18 1914
Established:

Opera Singer In Concert

ELISABETH BEHM VAN ENDERT

SHE is one of the leading lyric sopranos of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and is visiting America for the first time this winter. She will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight, when she will sing a number of modern lieder with orchestral accompaniment.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

1884

Liszt, Beethoven and Strauss on the [illegible] Programme.

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Carnegie Hall was attended by a typical audience which seemed to be much interested in the first two numbers and somewhat at a loss to know just what to make of the final one. The programme was wholly orchestral. The three compositions were Beethoven's fifth symphony, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria."

Weingartner, always original and fascinating in his comments, declared that "Hungaria" was a masterpiece. Doubtless those to whom the name of Liszt is holy will agree with the eminent conductor. But nevertheless the scoffers will continue to scoff. To them this composition, like several others of Liszt's, is an empty and meaningless repetition of phrases without special significance or beauty in themselves. The piece is admirably instrumented and should furnish further support, if any were needed, for the contention that Liszt contributed almost as much as Berlioz, perhaps quite as much, to the development of modern orchestration.

The performance of the music served to give the orchestra scope for a display of tonal splendors, and incidentally the concertmeister, Anton Witek, for a gypsy cadenza played in true spirit. The Beethoven symphony was performed with immense vigor and incisiveness of style, but without question there were moments when the balance of the orchestra was destroyed by the preponderance of the brass. Dr. Muck is fond of big fortes, and so are most men with blood in their veins, but there is a way to get them without oversetting the harmonic structure.

In the Strauss composition Dr. Muck demonstrated that he was not always affected by emotional yearnings for mere trombones. His reading was beautiful in fluency, clarity, balance and exquisite treatment of the dynamic developments of the work. We have heard the composition interpreted with greater passion, but never with a finer appreciation of its opulent instrumental beauties.

From EVENING JOURNAL Established:
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 23 1914

Es 1884

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS OF THE WEEK-END

There was variety and to spare in the concerts of orchestral music offered to New York music lovers on Saturday and Sunday. Dr. Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchtstra, at Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon, offered Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Liszt. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, at Aeolian Hall, yesterday afternoon, provided a programme exclusively of the music of Johannes Brahms and Josef Stransky, and the Philharmonic Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, at the same time selected for its audience's entertainment a diversity of musical fare from Gretry to Schubert and the Frenchman, Charpentier.

Dr. Muck's work of brilliant clarity in exposition of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms was followed by a similar treatment of Beethoven's great C minor symphony. This Fifth Symphony has no angles of novelty; it is possibly the best known symphonic work in the entire orchestral repertoire from Haydn down to the Russians of the minute. Nevertheless, there are still many manners and many styles of playing it, but of them all the best is the manner and the style that best reveals Beethoven.

This was the manner and the style in which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra deliberated themselves of this monument to Beethoven's lasting memory. Nor is this by any means the easiest or the simplest way of playing. Such interpretation means that significance, and the just significance, must be given to every phrase and every accent, every clarifying variation of dynamics and every interpretative shade of orchestral color. And this is what was accomplished.

Strauss's "Tod un Verklaerung," which followed the Beethoven work, is the sort of literary music the penetration of which presents little or no difficulty to a conductor such as Dr. Muck. It was played with brilliance, but neither virtuosity nor musicianship can wrap flesh around its bare, illustrative bones.

[illegible] programme of the New York

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 22 1914

THEATER und MUSIK

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das geſtrige Nachmittagskonzert der Boſtoner Gäſte in Carnegie Hall verlief in glänzender Weiſe. Dr. Muck bot eine ungemein großzügige und intereſſante Wiedergabe von Beethoven's Fünfter Symphonie, die ſein herrliches Orcheſter in beſtem Lichte zeigte. Er dirigirte ferner „Tod und Verklärung" von Richard Strauß, welches Werk er in ſtellenweiſe reichlich langſamem Zeitmaß ungemein klar und lichtvoll auslegte. Namentlich am Schluß konnte man ſich einer wirklichen Rührung nicht enthalten. Liszt's „Hungaria" halte ich für das ſchwächſte Orcheſterwerk des großen Weimarer Meiſters, und nicht einmal das wundervolle Spiel der Boſtoner konnte mir das Stück ſympathiſcher machen. Es war ein im Ganzen überaus genußvolles Konzert, das keinen Soliſten brachte. Ob die Zeit kommen wird, da man ſolche Lockmittel auf das große Publikum gänzlich verſchmähen wird? Der Saal war geſtern gänzlich ausverkauft, die Stimmung war

H.

Newspaper Cutting

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 22 1914

Established:

BEETHOVEN AND STRAUSS PLAYED BY BOSTONIANS

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Beethoven is being discovered all over again. Our conductors all unite in doing honor to him in their concert schemes. Yesterday afternoon, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he led the programme with his impeccable fifth symphony, in C minor—the work which is by some thought the most characteristically Beethovenesque he ever wrote. A work full of

After the symphony, Dr. Muck yesterday put the "Death and Transfiguration," of Strauss, which was played with the most scrupulous care and conscience. To say that in this wonderful tone-poem Strauss has succeeded in fully expressing the material and the mystical intentions of the title attached to it would be untruthful. But he has put anguish and terror, joy and gloom and transcendental glory into his music. What we might make of it without the programme notes, heaven only knows. Perhaps something of its mystery might be plain, though, even were no explanation of it set down in cold print.

The concert closed with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria." As has always been the case for some years past at the performances of the Boston orchestra, the huge Carnegie Hall auditorium was filled, from floor to ceiling.

While they played symphony at Carnegie Hall, at the Metropolitan a large audience was enjoying another admirable performance of a Russian masterpiece, "Boris Godounow," sung in Italian by a cast including Didur in the title part, Margarete Ober as Marina, Rothier as Pimenn, and other well known artists. Maestro Toscanini conducted.

The "popular" opera last night at the Metropolitan was "Die Walkuere,"

New York City

Date

Established: 1884

Dr. Karl Muck Laments Paucity of Modern Music

"MUSICAL composition is in a state of stagnation everywhere," said Dr. Karl Muck, the tall, slim conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose readings of Beethoven and Brahms are as near perfection as any that America has been privileged to hear and whose judgment in selecting what is best in present day novelties is on a par with his conducting of the classics.

No orchestra is more popular in this city than that which comes from Boston for ten concerts every year, and much of the prestige is due to the quiet, earnest conductor, who combines in a remarkable degree a profound musical knowledge with the ability to get all that can be had from his players.

"At least in the realm of pure music," ~~he added~~, "there seems to be a sort of 'let up' in the production of masterpieces. There are men of real greatness who are still alive, but they have for the most part said about all that they ever will say. Of course, there are many young men of promise who may arrive some day, but the present output is small.

"The most striking example of a man who apparently has used up all his ideas is Claude Debussy. He has done great service to the cause of music in his original use of the whole tone scale, and, in fact, has so many imitators that his ideas are responsible for almost the whole modern school in France. His earlier works were exquisite, although somewhat limited in scope, but he seems to have used up all the possibilities of his method and seems incapable of expanding.

"Ravel, whose suite, 'Ma Mere l'Oye,' was played at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an imitator of Debussy, who has been able to put enough that is new and that is his own into his writing to make it extremely interesting. There are instrumental affects in the score of 'Ma Mere l'Oye' so original and so cleverly placed that the most experienced ear often cannot tell from what instruments they are produced. But Ravel also writes in a limited field.

* * *

"THEN there are Dukas and Ducasse, who are writers of talent and followers of Debussy who can instil something of themselves into their works. But of all the French composers Florent Schmitt seems to be the most distinctive. He is not a follower of Debussy or any one else in particular. He can write in the delicate style of the others in the French school, but in addition he has the power to write music that is large, that grips with its intensity in a most effective manner.

"In Germany little of consequence is being done in the line of symphonic composition. Richard Strauss has become intensely interested in the opera and his energies are all in that direction. I do not think he ever will write another great symphonic poem. His development in pure music seems to have been arrested.

"Max Reger is a prolific composer. He writes easily and too much. One gets the impression that he is w[illegible] to order, a[illegible]

Strauss did in the "Festival Prelude," which we played this year and which showed many traces of being a made to order composition.

"Schoenberg is impossible. His harmonies have no relation to the generally accepted rules and it is a wonder to me how his works can evoke any applause. I can find no system in his writings—that is, in his latest ones—the quartet which the Flonzaley Quartet played is not in his worst vein—and I do not expect to attempt to play anything of his. The boy Krongold is a real wonder and gives promise of becoming a real master when he grows up.

* * *

"In Russia conditions are almost ideal. Rachmaninoff has to his credit his great orchestral work which was written many years ago, his symphony No. 2, which we played in Boston this year. Scriabine has invented a new scale system 'à la Debussy,' but it proved insufficient even for his own needs, as it bound him to narrow limits.

* * *

"HOW about Elgar and his new symphonic poem 'Falstaff?'"

Dr. Muck threw up his hands.

"We were offered the opportunity to have the first performance in America, but did not want it. There are, however, some interesting things being written in England and I performed a work of Holbrook recently with much satisfaction."

"The inevitable question had to come. 'Do you find that American music possesses signs of greatness?'

"I will produce soon in Boston a work by a local musician named Clapp—a work of large proportions and excellently written. George Chadwick, another resident of Boston, possesses much talent and I have been considering using one of his orchestral works at the next series of concerts in New York. I also have found interesting qualities in the earlier works of Henry Hadley, who has an almost too facile pen, and also of several others.

* * *

"I HAVE found a peculiar condition in musical tastes in New York, which can be explained easily enough when the cosmopolitan character of the population is taken into consideration. In the hundreds of letters which I receive requesting that certain numbers be played in the concerts here I find that scarcely two of them are alike. One wants more novelties, another wants none at all, and in the end I have to arrange the programmes in my own way without reference to the requests.

"In Boston they like novelties if they happen to be French. Boston has gone mad over French art in music, painting, sculpture and everything else. It seems queer that the one city in America which has retained its old rigid Puritan character more than any other should go to the extreme of getting its art from Paris."

[illegible] In Concert

From

ELISABETH BOEHM VAN ENDERT

SHE is one of the leading lyric sopranos of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, and is visiting America for the first time this winter. She will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight, when she will sing a number of modern lieder with orchestral accompaniment.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date FEB 19 1914
Established:

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN FINE CONCERT

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night made a singularly happy impression on the audience, partly due to the variety of styles represented in the program and also the most artistic singing of Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert.

The program opened with Brahms' Symphony in E minor (No. 4), perhaps the least generally popular and the most infrequently played of the four. Muck, however, above all things, is essentially an interpreter of Brahms' music, and last night many hidden and subtle beauties, in the generally stern and severe character of this symphony, were brought to light as we have never heard them before.

Many musicians of today, gorged with the excessive coloring, typical of the modern school, criticise the absence of this element in Brahms, [illegible] that he gives to his works a coloring peculiarly his own and altogether in keeping with the lofty and noble spirit of asceticism which pervades the greater part of his compositions—a quality which the musical world of today is desperately in need of, if only it had the sense to see it.

In this particular symphony the only flaw is the last movement, certain portions of which seem to lack the inspiration which, in a veiled form, is to be found in all the rest of it.

The next orchestral number, a vivid contrast in every respect, was the "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, a very picturesque work glowing with life and color as a whole, but very uneven in absolute musical value.

For instance, the second of the five movements which make up the group was full of the most delicate and fanciful orchestration possible, while the fourth, very realistic and descriptive of the scene it was meant to represent, practically resolved itself into a succession of extraordinary noises.

Mme. Van Endert contributed two separate groups of songs; the first [illegible] Hugo Wolf and Strauss, respectively, and the second by Humperdinck and D'Albert.

In all her five numbers she showed herself a consummate artist, possessing great charm of personality, and revealing altogether exceptional refinement of style and musical sympathy. Her singing evoked tremendous applause despite the fact that her voice in itself, though at times rarely beautiful, could not be described as in any way phenomenal.

The concert concluded with Cornelius' overture to the opera "The Barber of Bagdad," a very happy selection for the close of such a musical feast.

H. D. P.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date FEB 18 1914

Society Attends Concert

A fashionable audience filled the National Theater for the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Miss Eleanor Wilson occupied the Presidential box, and had with her Mrs. Cox and Miss Batten, house guests at the White House, and Miss Helen Woodrow Bones. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained in their box Mrs. George Howard and Mrs. Norman. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle occupied a box and had with her Mrs. Chandler Hale, and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe. Mrs. I. T. Mann entertained Mrs. Elmer Black, of New York, and Miss Flora Wilson in her box. Mrs. Marshall Field was one of the boxholders and had with her Mrs. Robert McCormick and Mrs. Hope Slater. Other boxholders were Mrs. William Crozier and Mrs. A. Lisner.

In the audience were the Minister of Sweden and Mme. Ekengren, Mme. Pezet, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mrs. Lyman Tiffany, Miss Helen Parker, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Chandler Anderson, Mrs. Thomas F. Bayard, Miss Marion Pellew, Mrs. James Harlan, Miss Elizabeth Davis, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Miss Mary Sheridan, Dr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Monsigneur Lee, Dr. Kirbey, Mrs. Paul Bartlett, Mrs. Frederick Chapin, Mrs. Milton McGill, Miss Ida Thompson, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Edward Burr, Mrs. M. Lewis Clarke, and Gen. and Mrs. Andrews.

JOURNAL—
FEBRUARY 28,

DR. MUCK ONCE MORE TRIUMPHS

Conducts Rare Performance of Mahler's "Giant" Symphony.

Dr. Muck once more, yesterday, led the Symphony Orchestra triumphantly through a thrilling performance of Mahler's "Giant Symphony," which was played early in the season, but which is being repeated at this week's concerts in response to many requests. The performance yesterday glorified the work, which is essentially lyrical, but yet bombastic. At the end of the hour and a quarter of orchestral singing and straining, the audience applauded with the utmost enthusiasm. It was one of the most thrilling ovations of the season.

The concert ended with another equally polished performance of Wagner's mellifluous birthday gift to his wife, the "Siegfried Idyl."

The feature of next week's Symphony program will be the first performance of the new symphony, on which Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the orchestra, has been at work for the past year or more. This is the largest purely orchestral work that Mr. Urack has yet attempted. The work is in four movements, and it is dedicated to Dr. Muck.

The second part of the program will comprise Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad;" Ravel's charming suite, "Mother Goose," which is to be repeated by request, and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody."

BOSTON GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 28,

MAHLER'S SYMPHONY.

Gigantic Fifth the Feature of Concert.

Music That Grows More Noble and More Prolix With Rehearing.

Dr Muck repeated Mahler's fifth symphony yesterday afternoon at the 16th rehearsal by request. The work, despite its excessive length, has made a deep impression at each performance—last Spring and again at the pair of concerts earlier this season. Again yesterday its reception was one [illegible] nounced admiration upon the part of the audience, and Dr Muck [illegible] recalled once more after the players had begun to leave their places for the intermission. The Siegfried Idyl formed the remaining part of the program.

With repeated hearings, Mahler's gigantic work grows more noble in certain of its pages and more prolix in others. The first movement contains material of that needed combination of mind and heart to incite true and uplifting emotion. The funeral march has been called vacuous by some and filled with pomp. It is not the most worthy passage of the score, but it is human and not without sincerity when played as it was yesterday. The scherzo suggests a man who insists upon masquerading in some gay or jocund character which suits him ill. He forgets his capers in philosophy and serious musing. The vein of the Viennese waltz is not one that Mahler maintains with ease or spontaneity, and the middle portion of the movement is best defined.

At each performance Dr Muck has taken the Adagietto—and truly it is marked sehr langsam—at a slower pace, until yesterday the continuity of the melodic line was quite lost. There was in it, however, an atmosphere, a permeating repose, an eternal quality as of music too vast to be circumscribed in tempo that made an effect. The closing measures, with their basses descending as to the foundation of the universe, the violins hanging upon a suspended promise of the future, are epic in their beauty. The last movement, with its tediously reiterated theme of the descending fourth is much too long and is often inconsequential.

The performance was one of sweeping spirit. There are many to whom particular praise belongs beside Dr Muck, particularly Mr Heim, the first trumpet, who still defies the merciless tessitura and keeps the heroic style.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date FEB 22 1914
Est 1884

MUCK READS BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY SUPERBLY.

Boston Orchestra Responds to Conductor's Demands by Giving Equally Good Performance.

Some of New York's conductors who do not make any too much of Beethoven music when they endeavor to interpret it might study to advantage the methods of Dr. Karl Muck.

The distinguished German musician gave a superb reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra responded in practically all respects to the demands of their leader.

Simple dignity and a degree of musical breadth so essential to a convincing presentation of Beethoven's symphonies were two factors always in evidence. Accompanying them were well chosen tempi, expressiveness pre-eminently as it should have been and a modelling of phrases of the highest character.

The playing of the orchestra was characterized by admirable tonal balance between the various choirs and for the most part a precision of attack and execution beyond legitimate reproach.

Success of similar proportions came to Dr. Muck and his orchestra in the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration," whose descriptive qualities were clearly and dramatically set forth.

One number, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hungaria," might well have been omitted from the programme, for it is inconsequential.

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY

THE SYMPHONY

Mahler's Great Symphony Repeted by Request at Yesterday's Concert

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Gustave Mahler's great symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor, was again given an exceedingly impressive performance under Dr. Muck. Played earlier this season, the symphony made such an impression that letters poured in at Symphony Hall asking for its repetition. The repetition made an effect even greater, if anything, than the first performance. Following the performance yesterday, in response to the applause, Dr. Muck had his men rise in acknowledgement of the enthusiasm of the audience, and the applause continued after the conductor had returned to the platform several times, and until members of the orchestra began to leave their places on the stage for the intermission.

In consideration of the length of this enormous symphony of Mahler, only one other short number was placed on the programme—the "Siegfried Idyll" of Richard Wagner, which was given an admirable performance.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourth in Series at Academy Receives Deserved Applause.

The fourth of the series of five philharmonic concerts was given last night at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck conducted and Mme. Elisabeth Van Endert was the soloist, assisting.

Long before the concert began the entire auditorium, including all the boxes, was well filled. The audience was most appreciative. Many times in the course of the evening were the artists greeted with prolonged applause for their masterful work. Their perfect accord made it seem as though the strains were coming from one big, sweet, melodious instrument, reaching the ears of everyone unspoiled by echo.

The programme, which follows, gave rise to many opportunities for [illegible] expression and sweet melody:

Symphony in D Minor, Lento, Allegro non troppo, Allegretto, Allegro non trippo (Cesar Franck); songs with orchestra, "Verborgenheit" (Wolf), "Wiegenlied" and "Caecilie" (Richard Strauss), Mme. Van Endert; tone poem, "Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration") op. 24 (Richard Strauss); songs with orchestra, "Es schaukeln die Winde" (Humperdinck), "Venushymne" (d'Albert), Mme. Van Endert; overture, "The Sold Bride" (Smetana).

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN

FEBRUARY 25, 1914

LOCAL INTELLIGENCE

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

ORCHESTRA IN AUDITORIUM

IN ORGAN FUND COURSE

A Superb Modern Program Played by 90 Men Under Dr Muck—Fine Singing by Mme Elisabeth Van Endert of the Boston Royal Opera.

This was what we had been waiting for. This was the ideal concert, in an ideal setting, which was dreamed of when the Auditorium was projected, and the more eagerly awaited when the hall revealed itself as a marvel of acoustical perfection. Many and superb concerts, orchestral and other, have been given there, and each has been a joy, but to crown the cup it was necessary to hear the paragon of orchestras in what Springfield feels to be a paragon of concert halls. This treat we owe to the managers of the organ fund course, who were fortunate enough to be able to induce the orchestra's management to reconsider. The Boston symphony orchestra used to visit this city regularly, and the discontinuance of the concerts, due to an increasing reluctance to play in the smaller cities, was a great disappointment to music lovers in this part of the state. It may be hoped that the new Auditorium may just turn the scale, and by making the occasion bigger and more brilliant attract such large audiences as to make these concerts once more a regular feature of the musical season.

The concert was notable in more than one way. Not only was it the first appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra in a hall that gave it full scope, but it was the first time the orchestra has given a modern program with the full orchestral forces for which such music calls. The orchestra, as everybody knows, is a variable one. For the classics a body of from 45 to 55 players suffices, according to the work and the size of the hall; adequately to render some of the elaborate modern scores needs a force of at least 90 men, extra players even being occasionally needed. When playing out of town the Boston orchestra naturally is accustomed as a rule to reduce its force and give works calling for less than the maximum number of players. This is entirely proper, and it is not at all a question of excellence—Beethoven with 60 players is better than Richard Strauss with half as many again. But the desire to hear some of the modern works given with the costly full resources of an orchestra of the first rank is natural and legitimate, and the new Auditorium gave a chance to gratify it; in a smaller hall so great a force would be out of place.

The concert was notable, too, for the first appearance here of the very distinguished and very gifted conductor, Dr Muck, since he returned to resume his work. His rare gifts the Springfield public has abundantly recognized, and its only quarrel with him has been a certain disdainfulness in the matter of programs, a failure to recognize that a town which hears a great orchestra seldom needs a stronger dose than will suffice for Boston. Last evening there was no room for faultfinding on this score, and while it would have been pleasant to hear another orchestral number, no doubt the general attractiveness of the concert was greatly increased by the singing of so notable an artist as Mme Elisabeth van Endert, soprano of the Royal opera in Berlin, who gave superbly the lovely air from "Der Freischuetz" and two songs with orchestral accompaniment.

But before going into details it will be well to look at the program as a whole:—

Symphony in B flat major, No 5, op. 55, Glazounoff
- I. Moderato maestoso; Allegro.
- II. Scherzo; Moderato; Pochissimo meno mosso.
- III. Andante.
- IV. Allegro maestoso.

Scene, "How tranquilly I slumbered," and aria, "Softly sighing," from "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Mme Van Endert.
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss
Songs with orchestra—
"Es schkeln die Winde" ....Humperdinck
"Venus Hymne" .... d'Albert
Mme Van Endert.
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt

It will be seen that it was precisely what was needed to correct the balance from previous years—a notable modern Russian symphony full of strong effects, the most popular of the wonderful tonal creations of the greatest of living orchestral technicians, Richard Strauss, and one of the most powerful and moving of the romantic works of the 19th century, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, a work so magniloquent that the largest orchestra is none too big for its thrilling effects. And the performance was quite up to the scale set by the program and the occasion. Dr Muck never fails, or very rarely fails, of his climax, but he achieves it by a fine regard for proportion, by keeping down rather than by piling on, by making his audience wait and molding its expectations. But last evening this careful reticene was unnecessary and from the very outset the performance was bold, forthputting and astir with

The Performance.

The symphony is not a great work nor does it assume to be; it is perfectly free from pretensions of every sort, and wonderfully fresh, spontaneous and genuine. In the working out of the first movement there are some perfunctory moments, giving the hearers that awareness of the passage of time which is the bacillus of ennui. But very quickly the composer recovers his hold on his material and rounds off a very fresh and interesting movement. At first it was not very easy to give full thought to the symphony for pleasure in the rich tonal effect. The work is rather heavily scored and at times sonorous, but the Auditorium held the sharpest forte without echo or confusion, and silence came instantly whenever the tone stopped. Yet so full was the resonance that the faintest throb of a plucked string had its full effect, and nothing was lost of the subtle overtones which give each instrument its special value. There is a kind of golden transparency, for example in the tone of the first violins, which can probably not be matched in any orchestra in the world, and which gains notably with a perfect concert-room for a resonator. Nothing, again, could be more delicately perfect than the dainty scherzo, a graceful movement, exquisitely played. The andante is a beautiful piece of cantabile, and the various instruments sung it most sweetly. The only strenuous part of the symphony is the finale, a rugged and turbulent allegro, sometimes harsh but of impressive energy and strength. It overweights the symphony a little, but gives it an effective finale.

The great achievement of the orchestra, however, came in Richard Strauss's tone poem, a work which seems far less revolutionary than it did when the century was new, but which is likely to stand out as the most successful of the astonishing tonal creations of this great innovator. In no other work has he so successfully brought the colossal resources of the modern orchestra to the service of a theme that needs them. Too often his ingenuity seems labored or trivially wasted on freakish experiments. In "Death and Transfiguration" he rises to entire sincerity and the work has, despite its complexity, a large unity and is capable when so consummately interpreted as last night of one of the most thrilling climaxes in the whole range of modern music. Here Dr Muck revealed himself as one of the very great masters of our time; it was marvelous to see how he held so firmly and easily all the threads of the intricate fabric, missing nothing, slighting nothing, steadily building up, massing his forces, driving home the emotional crisis which some susceptible listeners are apt to find of almost intolerable intensity. It is not a work of the very highest order—it is of the age of iron rather than the age of gold, a stupendous piece of musical engineering by a great intellect which for once has hold of a heart-shaking theme. But it is a wonderful creation and full of the spirit of modernity which seeks new and distant goals—here as so often music is the pioneer for the other arts.

It was, of course, no accident that the remaining orchestral number, "Les Preludes," had a kindred and complementary theme; there are no accidents in Dr Muck's programs. To find a work to follow "Death and Transfiguration" was not easy, so stupendous is its climax; Liszt's tone poem furnished an equally powerful climax of another sort, and was moreover all the more effective for being in so very different a style of instrumentation. In his handling of the orchestra Liszt is one of the very great masters, and even in his piano music his genius is orchestral. But he handles his orchestra more simply, in greater masses, and this solid and solemn sonority was all the more impressive for following Strauss's intricate score. It is only in comparatively recent times that the real genius of Liszt, long obscured by his fame as a virtuoso, has been fully recognised, but "Les Preludes" has always had vogue; it stands among his works something like "Death and Transfiguration" among those of Strauss in the high popular favor given it, and its pre-eminence has not yet been disturbed by the growing appreciation of his other compositions. It is a work of high and moving eloquence, full of those seductive half-melodies, vague romantic stirring strange memories, for which Liszt had such genius. The performance was no less wonderful than that of "Tod und Verklaerung" and the emotional response was perhaps even greater.

For some reason it had been a long time since any singer had given us that wonderful Weber aria "Leise, leise," and it was the greater pleasure to hear it from so accomplished and interesting an artist as Mme van Endert. She has most of the gifts needed for a dramatic soprano of the first rank if she should ever undergo transfer from the lyric field of which she is such an ornament. Her voice is ample and her singing has warmth and feeling. In sheer beauty of tone there is sometimes a slight shortcoming, yet the tone is solid, rich, and satisfying. This aria is of great difficulty, yet it was hard to realize as she sang it that it is a severe tax upon a singer's strength and endurance, and throughout her style was marked by nobility. She was much less successful in the little Humperdinck cradle song; here her singing was too detached, missed the smooth flow of a perfect cantilene. But she was superb in the "Hymn to Venus," the ampler style of which gave a better chance to her special qualities. She is still a young singer, and will go far. The audience was large and enthusiastic, and the concert must be put down among not more than three or four of the very finest that Springfield has heard since the records begin.

BOSTON HERALD

FEBRUARY 28, 1914

MAHLER'S HUGE 5TH SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN

Enthusiastically Received at 16th Public Rehearsal in Symphony Hall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows: Mahler, Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyl.

Mahler's Symphony was played here in November last. It was played for the second time this season at the request of many, and the performance yesterday was even more brilliant than the earlier one. This was the fifth performance in eight years, an unusual record for a modern symphonic work of large proportions. Mr. Gericke, who conducted the first two performances, made cuts—for the symphony is inordinately long—and he changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Dr. Muck, who led two performances in 1913, produced the symphony as Mahler wrote it. It is a pity that the composer, excellent conductor that he was, could not have been one of the audience yesterday and heard the superb performance and the enthusiastic applause, the glowing tribute paid to his music, the interpreter and the orchestra.

It is not necessary to discuss again the symphony itself. It is undeniably long, and its extreme length is felt especially in the finale, partly because ears are by that time sated, partly because there are pages of comparatively little interest except perhaps to students of counterpoint. Nor is it blasphemous to say that the first and second movements would be still more impressive if the composer had been more concise. Yet he knew what he wished and he built his colossal works deliberately. He, no doubt, would have preferred that his fifth symphony should stand alone on a program; that there should be more than conventional pauses between the movements.

Many years ago Petronius, attacking masters of rhetoric, accused them of enormous, windy loquacity, and said that it emigrated from Asia to Athens and thus eloquence, corrupted, withered and soon became mute. The Abbe Morellet quoted this sentence in reproach of Chateaubriand, and now in 1914 the ingenious Raymond Bouyer remembers it, hearing in Paris music by Richard Strauss and the fourth symphony of Mahler. He accuses the two of sympathy for the enormous. He finds that Mahler poured Russian tea into the Viennese glass of Schubert, while Strauss, more of an occidental, has "decorated his sonorous mountain with the most amiable flowers of Munich sensuality."

And so the critics find in huge compositions the more material for copy, and may say that a symphony is only an excuse for a feuilleton. Now that Mahler's fifth is well known to the public in Boston; now that audiences are somewhat acquainted with Mahler's musical idiom, why should we not hear one or two of the other symphonies? This fifth is of strange, massive and, as some think, doubtful architecture, with ornamentation now gorgeous, now vulgar. The honesty and the ability of the builder are indisputable.

The choice of the Siegfried Idyl was a happy one, if there was need of another composition on the program. While the Idyl was beautifully played, it showed that Wagner could be as prolix with regard to a child as when portraying a Wotan or a Hans Sachs.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Urack, symphony in E major (MS. First performance), conducted by the composer; Smetana, symphonic poem "Vysehrad"; Ravel, "Mother Goose" (repeated by request); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1.

ADVERTISER

FEBRUARY 28.

MAHLER SYMPHONY NO. 5 REPEATED

WAGNER "SIEGFRIED IDYLL" COMPLETES PROGRAMME

Former Work, Given by Request, Still Shown to Be "Programme Music"—One Great Movement.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mahler........................Symphony No. 5
Wagner........................"Siegfried Idyll"

The Mahler symphony is a programme by itself, an entire concert. Repeated performance causes our orchestra to give a most excellent interpretation of the very difficult work, but repeated hearing scarcely changes the opinion of the reviewer that it is programme music with the explanation omitted. We have now had this symphony three times within a year. If Mahler had ended with the first movement he would have achieved almost a masterpiece, for here there are passages of the loftiest grandeur, and the movement is about half-an-hour long in itself. But after this excellent half-hour one passes a "mauvais quart d'heure" in the Scherzo, and even the tender Adagietto in the Finale comes with some redundancy.

We recognize points of greatness in the work and a supreme mastery of orchestral effects, but we doubt if Mahler is to grow greater in these Schoenbergian days.

As a third review of the work may not prove interesting to our regular readers, and as we have been asked to reprint our poem on the modern symphony, and as it may fit as a review of the work, we give it, just as the Mahler symphony was given—"Repeated by general request."

A MODERN SYMPHONY.

One Saturday at evening,
The critic's work was done,
He sat within the Music Hall,
The concert had begun.
And by his side there might be seen
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there
With programme-book in hand
And asked the critic to explain
What ailed the music-band.
What was the work that Muck had found
That was so big and full of sound.

The critic gazed upon the boy
That stood expectant by,
He knit his brows, he scratched his head,
He heaved a natural sigh.
'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he,
That wrote a monster symphonie.

I find them often hereabout,
When I to concerts wend.
Strange shapeless things, with gongs and drums,
And trombones without end.
For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,
Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,
Young Peterkin, he cries,
While little Wilhelmine looked up
Half-deafened, in surprise.
Now tell us all about the score
And what they make such racket for.

It was a German, he replied,
A modern one, no doubt,
But what he wrote such discords for
I cannot well make out.
But everybody says, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, and eleventh, and worse,
And discords in all keys,
He turns the music inside out
With unknown harmonies.
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big brass tubas won,
And kettle-drums, I ween.
Why, 'twas a very ugly thing,
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

Our Dr. Muck much praise has won
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last?
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he.
It is a Modern Symphonie.

We cannot help thinking that the strange, almost incomprehensible, work of Sibelius demands repetition somewhat more urgently than this more prolix, but more intelligible symphony of Mahler.

Then, by way of contrast, came the gentlest, most cooing work, of the domestic Wagner. This composer did not make such a fuss about his domestic affairs as Richard Strauss, and the "Siegfried Idyll" is a most tender picture of family felicity. Of course, however, the auditor, if he would thoroughly enjoy the picture, must put all thoughts of Minna Planer and Hans Von Bulow out of his mind. He must try to forget that the happiness of Richard and Cosima Wagner was founded upon the unhappiness of two other people who had prior claims.

Of course the two works of the programme were in the most vivid contrast and displayed our great conductor in two diametrically opposite fields. But we cannot but think that few auditors could turn at once from the "King Cambyses vein" to the cradling, lulling style of Mme. Wagner's Christmas present, even if a walk in the corridor did separate the two compositions. The litele tone-poem wears well and shows how versatile the musical giant of the last half of the 19th century was. Beethoven and Wagner sum up the musical glory of that century.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN

FEBRUARY 25, 1914.

LOCAL INTELLIGENCE

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

ORCHESTRA IN AUDITORIUM

IN ORGAN FUND COURSE

A Superb Modern Program Played by 90 Men Under Dr Muck—Fine Singing by Mme Elisabeth Van Endert of the Boston Royal Opera.

This was what we had been waiting for. This was the ideal concert, in an ideal setting, which was dreamed of when the Auditorium was projected, and the more eagerly awaited when the hall revealed itself as a marvel of acoustical perfection. Many and superb concerts, orchestral and other, have been given there, and each has been a joy, but to crown the cup it was necessary to hear the paragon of orchestras in what Springfield feels to be a paragon of concert halls. This treat we owe to the managers of the organ fund course, who were fortunate enough to be able to induce the orchestra's management to reconsider. The Boston symphony orchestra used to visit this city regularly, and the discontinuance of the concerts, due to an increasing reluctance to play in the smaller cities, was a great disappointment to music lovers in this part of the state. It may be hoped that the new Auditorium may just turn the scale, and by making the occasion bigger and more brilliant attract such large audiences as to make these concerts once more a regular feature of the musical season.

The concert was notable in more than one way. Not only was it the first appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra in a hall that gave it full scope, but it was the first time the orchestra has given a modern program with the full orchestral forces for which such music calls. The orchestra, as everybody knows, is a variable one. For the classics a body of from 45 to 55 players suffices, according to the work and the size of the hall; adequately to render some of the elaborate modern scores needs a force of at least 90 men, extra players even being occasionally needed. When playing out of town the Boston orchestra naturally is accustomed as a rule to reduce its force and give works calling for less than the maximum number of players. This is entirely proper, and it is not at all a question of excellence—Beethoven with 60 players is better than Richard Strauss with half as many again. But the desire to hear some of the modern works given with the costly full resources of an orchestra of the first rank is natural and legitimate, and the new Auditorium gave a chance to gratify it; in a smaller hall so great a force would be out of place.

The concert was notable, too, for the first appearance here of the very distinguished and very gifted conductor, Dr Muck, since he returned to resume his work. His rare gifts the Springfield public has abundantly recognized, and its only quarrel with him has been a certain disdainfulness in the matter of programs, a failure to recognize that a town which hears a great orchestra seldom needs a stronger dose than will suffice for Boston. Last evening there was no room for faultfinding on this score, and while it would have been pleasant to hear another orchestral number, no doubt the general attractiveness of the concert was greatly increased by the singing of so notable an artist as Mme Elisabeth van Endert, soprano of the Royal opera in Berlin, who gave superbly the lovely air from "Der Freischuetz" and two songs with orchestral accompaniment.

But before going into details it will be well to look at the program as a whole:—

Symphony in B flat major, No 5, op 55, Glazounoff
I. Moderato maestoso; Allegro.
II. Scherzo; Moderato; Pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.
Scene, "How tranquilly I slumbered," and aria, "Softly sighing," from "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Mme Van Endert.
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss

Songs with orchestra—
"Es schkeln die Winde" ....Humperdinck
"Venus Hymne" .... d'Albert
Mme Van Endert.
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" .... Liszt

It will be seen that it was precisely what was needed to correct the balance from previous years—a notable modern Russian symphony full of strong effects, the most popular of the wonderful tonal creations of the greatest of living orchestral technicians, Richard Strauss, and one of the most powerful and moving of the romantic works of the 19th century, "Les Preludes," by Liszt, a work so magniloquent that the largest orchestra is none too big for its thrilling effects. And the performance was quite up to the scale set by the program and the occasion. Dr Muck never fails, or very rarely fails, of his climax, but he achieves it by a fine regard for proportion, by keeping down rather than by piling on, by making his audience wait and molding its expectations. But last evening this careful reticene was unnecessary and from the very outset the performance was bold, forthputting and astir with life.

The Performance.

The symphony is not a great work nor does it assume to be; it is perfectly free from pretensions of every sort, and wonderfully fresh, spontaneous and genuine. In the working out of the first movement there are some perfunctory moments, giving the hearers that awareness of the passage of time which is the bacillus of ennui. But very quickly the composer recovers his hold on his material and rounds off a very fresh and interesting movement. At first it was not very easy to give full thought to the symphony for pleasure in the rich tonal effect. The work is rather heavily scored and at times sonorous, but the Auditorium held the sharpest forte without echo or confusion, and silence came instantly whenever the tone stopped. Yet so full was the resonance that the faintest throb of a plucked string had its full effect, and nothing was lost of the subtle overtones which give each instrument its special value. There is a kind of golden transparency, for example in the tone of the first violins, which can probably not be matched in any orchestra in the world, and which gains notably with a perfect concert-room for a resonator. Nothing, again, could be more delicately perfect than the dainty scherzo, a graceful movement, exquisitely played. The andante is a beautiful piece of cantabile, and the various instruments sung it most sweetly. The only strenuous part of the symphony is the finale, a rugged and turbulent allegro, sometimes harsh but of impressive energy and strength. It overweights the symphony a little, but gives it an effective finale.

The great achievement of the orchestra, however, came in Richard Strauss's tone poem, a work which seems far less revolutionary than it did when the century was new, but which is likely to stand out as the most successful of the astonishing tonal creations of this great innovator. In no other work has he so successfully brought the colossal resources of the modern orchestra to the service of a theme that needs them. Too often his ingenuity seems labored or trivially wasted on freakish experiments. In "Death and Transfiguration" he rises to entire sincerity and the work has, despite its complexity, a large unity and is capable when so consummately interpreted as last night of one of the most thrilling climaxes in the whole range of modern music. Here Dr Muck revealed himself as one of the very great masters of our time; it was marvelous to see how he held so firmly and easily all the threads of the intricate fabric, missing nothing, slighting nothing, steadily building up, massing his forces, driving home the emotional crisis which some susceptible listeners are apt to find of almost intolerable intensity. It is not a work of the very highest order—it is of the age of iron rather than the age of gold, a stupendous piece of musical engineering by a great intellect which for once has hold of a heart-shaking theme. But it is a wonderful creation and full of the spirit of modernity which seeks new and distant goals—here as so often music is the pioneer for the other arts.

It was, of course, no accident that the remaining orchestral number, "Les Preludes," had a kindred and complementary theme; there are no accidents in Dr Muck's programs. To find a work to follow "Death and Transfiguration" was not easy, so stupendous is its climax; Liszt's tone poem furnished an equally powerful climax of another sort, and was moreover all the more effective for being in so very different a style of instrumentation. In his handling of the orchestra Liszt is one of the very great masters, and even in his piano music his genius is orchestral. But he handles his orchestra more simply, in greater masses, and this solid and solemn sonority was all the more impressive for following Strauss's intricate score. It is only in comparatively recent times that the real genius of Liszt, long obscured by his fame as a virtuoso, has been fully recognized, but "Les Preludes" has always had vogue; it stands among his works something like "Death and Transfiguration" among those of Strauss in the high popular favor given it, and its pre-eminence has not yet been disturbed by the growing appreciation of his other compositions. It is a work of high and moving eloquence, full of those seductive half-melodies, vague, romantic, stirring strang memories, for which Liszt had such genius. The performance was no less wonderful than that of "Tod und Verklaerung" and the emotional response was perhap even greater.

For some reason it had been a lon time since any singer had given us tha wonderful Weber aria "Leise, leise," an it was the greater pleasure to hear it fro so accomplished and interesting an artis as Mme van Endert. She has most of th gifts needed for a dramatic soprano of th first rank if she should ever undergo transfer from the lyric field of which sh is such an ornament. Her voice is ampl and her singing has warmth and feeling. In sheer beauty of tone there is sometimes a slight shortcoming, yet the tone is solid, rich, and satisfying. This aria is of great difficulty, yet it was hard to realize as she sang it that it is a severe tax upon a singer's strength and endurance, and throughout her style was marked by nobility. She was much less successful in the little Humperdinck cradle song; here her singing was too detached, missed the smooth flow of a perfect cantilene. But she was superb in the "Hymn to Venus," the ampler style of which gave a better chance to her special qualities. She is still a young singer, and will go far. The audience was large and enthusiastic, and the concert must be put down among not more than three or four of the very finest that Springfield has heard since the records begin.

BOSTON HERALD

FEBRUARY 28, 1914.

MAHLER'S HUGE 5TH SYMPHONY HEARD AGAIN

Enthusiastically Received at 16th Public Rehearsal in Symphony Hall.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The program was as follows: Mahler, Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5; Wagner, A Siegfried Idyl.

Mahler's Symphony was played here in November last. It was played for the second time this season at the request of many, and the performance yesterday was even more brilliant than the earlier one. This was the fifth performance in eight years, an unusual record for a modern symphonic work of large proportions. Mr. Gericke, who conducted the first two performances, made cuts—for the symphony is inordinately long—and he changed the instrumentation of certain passages. Dr. Muck, who led two performances in 1913, produced the symphony as Mahler wrote it. It is a pity that the composer, excellent conductor that he was, could not have been one of the audience yesterday and heard the superb performance and the enthusiastic applause, the glowing tribute paid to his music, the interpreter and the orchestra.

It is not necessary to discuss again the symphony itself. It is undeniably long, and its extreme length is felt especially in the finale, partly because ears are by that time sated, partly because there are pages of comparatively little interest except perhaps to students of counterpoint. Nor is it blasphemous to say that the first and second movements would be still more impressive if the composer had been more concise. Yet he knew what he wished and he built his colossal works deliberately. He, no doubt, would have preferred that his fifth symphony should stand alone on a program; that there should be more than conventional pauses between the movements.

Many years ago Petronius, attacking masters of rhetoric, accused them of enormous, windy loquacity, and said that it emigrated from Asia to Athens and thus eloquence, corrupted, withered and soon became mute. The Abbe Morellet quoted this sentence in reproach of Chateaubriand, and now in 1914 the ingenious Raymond Bouyer remembers it, hearing in Paris music by Richard Strauss and the fourth symphony of Mahler. He accuses the two of sympathy for the enormous. He finds that Mahler poured Russian tea into the Viennese glass of Schubert, while Strauss, more of an occidental, has "decorated his sonorous mountain with the most amiable flowers of Munich sensuality."

And so the critics find in huge compositions the more material for copy, and may say that a symphony is only an excuse for a feuilleton. Now that Mahler's fifth is well known to the public in Boston; now that audiences are somewhat acquainted with Mahler's musical idiom, why should we not hear one or two of the other symphonies? This fifth is of strange, massive and, as some think, doubtful architecture, with ornamentation now gorgeous, now vulgar. The honesty and the ability of the builder are indisputable.

The choice of the Siegfried Idyl was a happy one, if there was need of another composition on the program. While the Idyl was beautifully played, it showed that Wagner could be as prolix with regard to a child as when portraying a Wotan or a Hans Sachs.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Urack, symphony in E major (MS. First performance), conducted by the composer; Smetana, symphonic poem "Vysehrad"; Ravel, "Mother Goose" (repeated by request); Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody, A major, op. 11, No. 1.

ADVERTISER

FEBRUARY 28.

MAHLER SYMPHONY NO. 5 REPEATED

WAGNER "SIEGFRIED IDYLL" COMPLETES PROGRAMME

Former Work, Given by Request, Still Shown to Be "Programme Music"—One Great Movement.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mahler........................Symphony No. 5
Wagner.......................“Siegfried Idyll”

The Mahler symphony is a programme by itself, an entire concert. Repeated performance causes our orchestra to give a most excellent interpretation of the very difficult work, but repeated hearing scarcely changes the opinion of the reviewer that it is programme music with the explanation omitted. We have now had this symphony three times within a year. If Mahler had ended with the first movement he would have achieved almost a masterpiece, for here there are passages of the loftiest grandeur, and the movement is about half-an-hour long in itself. But after this excellent half-hour one passes a "mauvais quart d'heure" in the Scherzo, and even the tender Adagietto in the Finale comes with some redundancy.

We recognize points of greatness in the work and a supreme mastery of orchestral effects, but we doubt if Mahler is to grow greater in these Schoenbergian days.

As a third review of the work may not prove interesting to our regular readers, and as we have been asked to reprint our poem on the modern symphony, and as it may fit as a review of the work, we give it, just as the Mahler symphony was given—"Repeated by general request."

A MODERN SYMPHONY.

One Saturday at evening,
The critic's work was done,
He sat within the Music Hall,
The concert had begun.
And by his side there might be seen
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there
With programme-book in hand
And asked the critic to explain
What ailed the music-band.
What was the work that Muck had found
That was so big and full of sound.

The critic gazed upon the boy
That stood expectant by,
He knit his brows, he scratched his head,
He heaved a natural sigh.
'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he,
That wrote a monster symphonie.

I find them often hereabout,
When I to concerts wend.
Strange shapeless things, with gongs and drums,
And trombones without end.
For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,
Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,
Young Peterkin, he cries,
While little Wilhelmine looked up
Half-deafened, in surprise.
Now tell us all about the score
And what they make such racket for.

It was a German, he replied,
A modern one, no doubt,
But what he wrote such discords for
I cannot well make out.
But everybody says, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, and eleventh, and worse,
And discords in all keys,
He turns the music inside out
With unknown harmonies.
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big brass tubas won,
And kettle-drums, I ween.
Why, 'twas a very ugly thing,
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

Our Dr. Muck much praise has won
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last?
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he.
It is a Modern Symphonie.

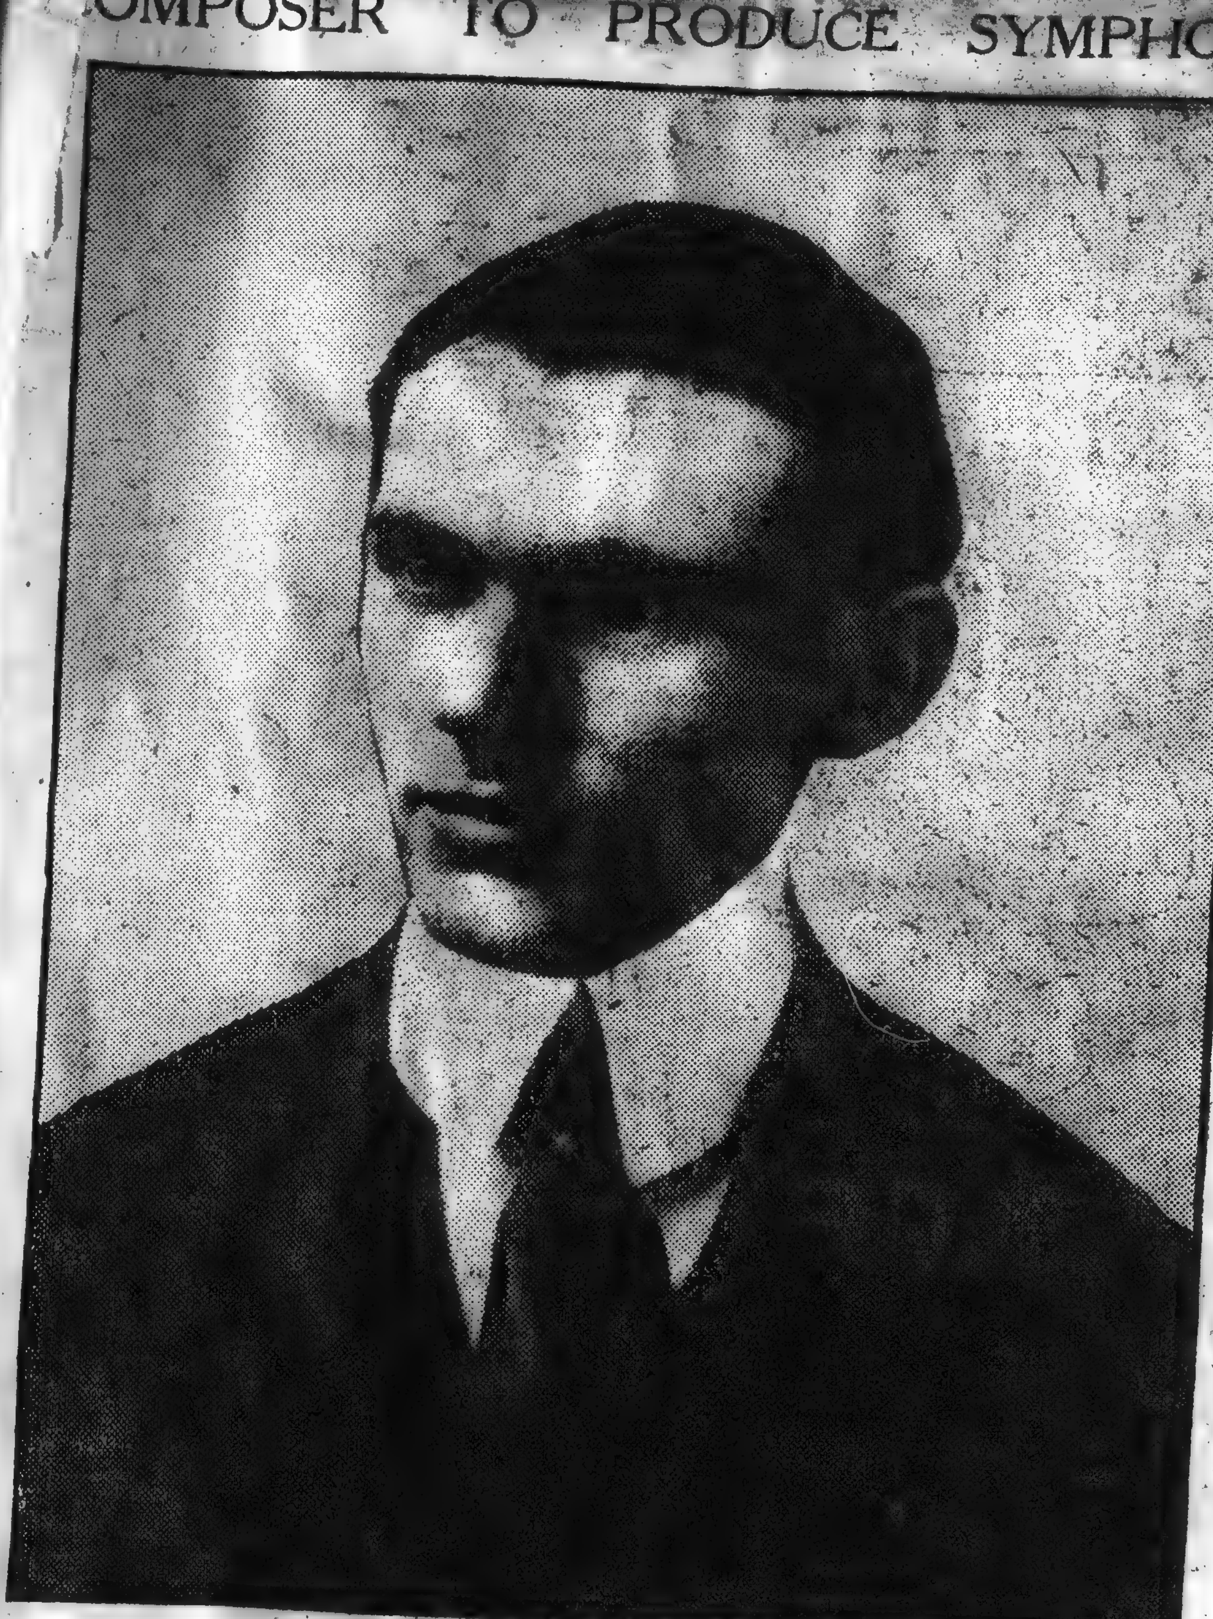
We cannot help thinking that the strange, almost incomprehensible, work of Sibelius demands repetition somewhat more urgently than this more prolix, but more intelligible symphony of Mahler.

Then, by way of contrast, came the gentlest, most cooing work, of the domestic Wagner. This composer did not make such a fuss about his domestic affairs as Richard Strauss, and the "Siegfried Idyll" is a most tender picture of family felicity. Of course, however, the auditor, if he would thoroughly enjoy the picture, must put all thoughts of Minna Planer and Hans Von Bulow out of his mind. He must try to forget that the happiness of Richard and Cosima Wagner was founded upon the unhappiness of two other people who had prior claims.

Of course the two works of the programme were in the most vivid contrast and displayed our great conductor in two diametrically opposite fields. But we cannot but think that few auditors could turn at once from the "King Cambyses vein" to the cradling, lulling style of Mme. Wagner's Christmas present, even if a walk in the corridor did separate the two compositions. The litele tone-poem wears well and shows how versatile the musical giant of the last half of the 19th century was. Beethoven and Wagner sum up the musical glory of that century.

ONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY

OMPOSER TO PRODUCE SYMPHONY



(Photo by E. Chickering, Boston)

Otto Urack will interpret his own work

Otto Urack, known for the past two seasons as assistant conductor of the Symphony orchestra and as one of the two solo violoncello players of the organization, will present himself at the public rehearsal of March 6 and at the concert of March 7 as a composer, when he will conduct from manuscript his symphony in E major, a work he has written since he came to Boston.

"I used the key of E," explained Mr. Urack in talking at his house with a Monitor caller, "because that is a tonality of sunshine and high color. It is a key that symphony composers, particularly those of classic days, neglected, but it is one that just suited my feeling. When I came to America I was earnestly considering the idea of composing an opera, for I had been hard at work as an opera conductor and I was deeply interested in the stage. But when I joined the Symphony orchestra my thoughts turned at once from that to the composition of a work in one of the concert forms. When I had opportunity to direct the orchestra I was so impressed with its brilliant and sonorous playing that I determined to write something or it. I felt that the most appropriate sentiment to express through such a wealth of tone was that of joy. And I at once began to sketch a symphony. I finished the sketch in a short time and had my work in shape to play on the piano in January of last year. I started to write the orchestration and worked at it for the rest of the season and during the summer, finishing it in October, 1913. I scored the last two movements and the trio of the scherzo during vacation in Germany. The rest of it I scored here."

The E major symphony is in strict classic form and is not written to a program. "There was something in me," commented Mr. Urack, as he went to the piano and opened the autograph score of his work, "to which I had to give sound and life. It was not anything in book, picture or nature that started me writing. I had an impulse to express myself in melody and I went ahead. Long and flowing themes, such as sing well in the solo voices of the orchestra, are my preference in music. Harmony I like well, but not, as so many composers of today do, for its own sake. Orchestral writers are inclined, according to my view, to exploit their theoretical knowledge too much and to neglect melodic idea."

Mr. Urack's work, as he turned the pages and played it over, proved to be in the regular four movements, with the slow movement second and the scherzo third. The opening division is the longest, requiring about 18 minutes in performance. The scherzo is comparatively short and the final movement is compact. Thematic development is carried out extensively in the opening allegro, according to the usual manner of symphony writers. But direct statement—concise paragraphing and rapid marshaling of thoughts characterize the [illegible] composition. Unity [illegible] or [illegible] is attained by the systematic introduction throughout the piece of a motive which serves as first theme of the allegro. This is something more than the motto type of theme which the classic composers availed themselves of and something less than the characterizing melody with which the writers of symphonic poems have held their compositions together. It is inclined to speak up at moments of transition and to serve as bridge from one group of thoughts to the next. It is thus a means of artistic economy rather than of musical mechanics. It gives the impression that the composer is sticking to his main point but not that he is arbitrarily riveting all the portions of his work into a structural whole.

The first movement is characterized by the mood defined in Italian terminology as appassionato. The high point of the development comes when the two main themes are worked together with a third theme, the double quartet of French horns giving out a strain built from the chord of D, uncertain whether to declare themselves for the major or the minor. This passage is delivered with the full power of the orchestra and it is followed by a gentle song which gives assurance that an uncertainty is resolved. In the first movement there is original use of the harmonium with oboe and flute in solo passages.

The adagio is in D flat m[illegible] begins softly in the brass choi[illegible] ently the violins enter. In the second part two solo violins and harmonium a heard. There is a return to the fi theme, the strings taking in their upper range the melody which the horns had in tenor compass. Later the full orchestra presents it. There follows, by way of review, a passage in which first and second themes are worked together. The coda introduces a new idea. Themes of the first movement reappear softly at the close.

The scherzo, in E minor, three quarter time, is brilliant, swift and playful. It contains a trio with a singing theme which is constantly interrupted. One voice after another tries to take it up but is not allowed to carry it through, and truce is declared by a general return to the scherzo.

The last movement opens presto appassionato, and there are two themes. In the middle of the movement all th ideas of the symphony are assemble and toward the close the principal melody of the first movement is heard i the low voices as a sort of hymn. Ther is a sonorous close.

* * *

Orchestra Matinee Audience Enthusiastic Over Mahler Fifth Symphony, Listening to It for Second Time Under Mr. Muck

WAGNER "IDYL" HEARD

Mahler's fifth symphony in C sharp minor, played for the second time this season, was the principal number on the program of the Symphony orchestra rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Its interpretation under the baton of Karl Muck held the attention of the house even closer than when it was given in the early part of the winter and there was such enthusiastic hand-clapping at the close that the players had to stand not only once but twice. The conductor himself joined in with the audience in applauding the artists, disclaiming the credit of the performance himself. There was but one other number on the program, the "Siegfried Idyl," and the playing of this was attended with the usual acclaim of Dr. Muck's Wagnerian selections.

There is now no question about the favor of Mahler with the Boston orchestral public. His music has won a place in the affections of Symphony concert listeners as firm apparently as that which the music of Richard Strauss held a few years ago. It would be an interesting contribution to social knowledge if somebody should carefully stud and ascertain just what difference i makes in the artistic world that th Boston public has given its approval t the composer. Mahler's work was pr sented last season at the Symphony co certs doubtless for the reason that was regarded by the conductor as go for the public to know. The enlighte ment of Bostonians in the modern o chestral repertory would be incomple without a performance of this vast co position, which had been presented them but once before and then inc pletely. Now that they have heard it two successive years and twice in t present year at general request, it wou be a significant piece of information for somebody to bring in, whether the record of performances and their acclaim make any impression outside of Boston and the cities of the Syhphony orchestra circuit.

* * *

On the program with Otto Urack's new symphony at the Symphony concerts of March 6 and 7 will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite (repeated by request) and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody."

The program which Dr. Muck has chosen for the pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra on the afternoon of March 8 in Symphony hall consists of Wagnerian selections, as follows: Introduction to third act and dance of the apprentices from "Meistersinger"; Fichter's arrangement of portions of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," "Tannhaeuser" overture, "Lohengrin" prelude, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Kaisermarsch."

MONITOR, BOSTON

FEBRUARY 28, 1914

SYMPHONY LEA BUYS A HO

Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, who has bou house at 50 Fenway, is said to ha looking for a permanent residence ever since he returned to Boston for his second engagement with the orchestra in the fall of 1912. Dr. Muck and Mrs. Muck have been living in an apartment while waiting to find the building they de[illegible]. It is understood that they will make [illegible] house ready for occupancy when they retur[illegible] summer in Europe.

DR. KARL MUCK'S HOUSE

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

FEBRUARY 28, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPETITIONS MAKE ANOTHER NEW PRECEDENT

Mahler's Symphony and the "Siegfried Idyl" Again — Dr. Muck's Innovations in American Routine — Mahler and Bruckner

FOR the first time within long recollections, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was a concert of repetitions. That is to say, Mahler's fifth symphony, revived last April by Dr. Muck and the orchestra, and played again by them last November, was repeated yet once more in deference to requests—a hundred strong—that have come to the conductor. For after-piece, though the symphony in its demands upon players and hearers might well suffice for a whole concert, came Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," music that Dr. Muck cherishes and that he restored last year to the active repertory of the orchestra. Even the repetition of a novel piece in the season in which it is first played is a relatively rare procedure in symphony concerts in America. It is much commoner in Europe, where a new and, maybe, controverted symphony or tone-poem is sometimes played twice in a single concert. When a conductor does so he runs the risk of cloying his hearers with the piece and leaves them little time to sort out and clarify their first impressions. It seems wiser to defer the repetition for a time so that the audience may come again to the novel or the debated music still fresh to it and yet not altogether unacquainted with its [illegible] and its [illegible] association [illegible] ner. If the first hearing gave the listener pleasure then will he be glad to renew his satisfactions and add others to them. If the music baffled him, then he may return to be enlightened. If he resented it—as some resent ultra-modern music as though the innocent composer had designed it as a personal affront to them—then may he stay away or come, after the manner of men, to feed his resentment afresh.

During his first term as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts Dr. Muck occasionally ventured such repetitions—with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Debussy's sea-pieces for example. When he returned he did not renew the excellent practice, perhaps because none of the "novelties" of last year quickened enough interest to warrant it. Last autumn he returned to it with a repetition of this same symphony of Mahler and a week hence he and the orchestra are to play again Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose," heard first at Christmas time and warmly liked. Between and in his usual unobtrusive fashion, Dr. Muck has set a new precedent in the concert of yesterday, with Mahler's symphony and Wagner's idyl, altogether a concert of repetitions of pieces that he has revived and carried to very eloquent performance. Mahler's mighty symphony has been plentifully described and discussed in this place; scarcely less has been said of the revealing, exalting and deeply moving performance that it receives at the conductor's and the orchestra's hands. That performance yesterday differed in no essential respect from its predecessors unless the conductor drew out too slowly the songful beauty of the slow movement.

One explanation of the slow pace that some conductors now use with Wagner's operas runs that he himself in the last days of his conducting in rehearsal at Baireuth so hung upon his own music, because in the emotion that welled within him he would draw the last drop from it. Yet when he had created that same music he had clearly designed it to move faster. On the edge of a similar pitfall, Dr. Muck seems to stand with the Adagietto of Mahler's symphony. When he first re-created it, the pace that he chose imparted and intensified the beauty of the contemplative and aspiring song. At each subsequent repetition, he has seemed by the impression of the ear, whether or not watch or metronome would verify it, to linger increasingly over it, Wagner-wise. The poise to which Dr. Muck keeps the delicate virtuosity of the orchestra in the "Siegfried Idyl" so that it never becomes a dry and finicking adeptness is not the least of the satisfactions of the present performance of it. With Mahler's adagietto, he himself imperils in another aspect that very poise.

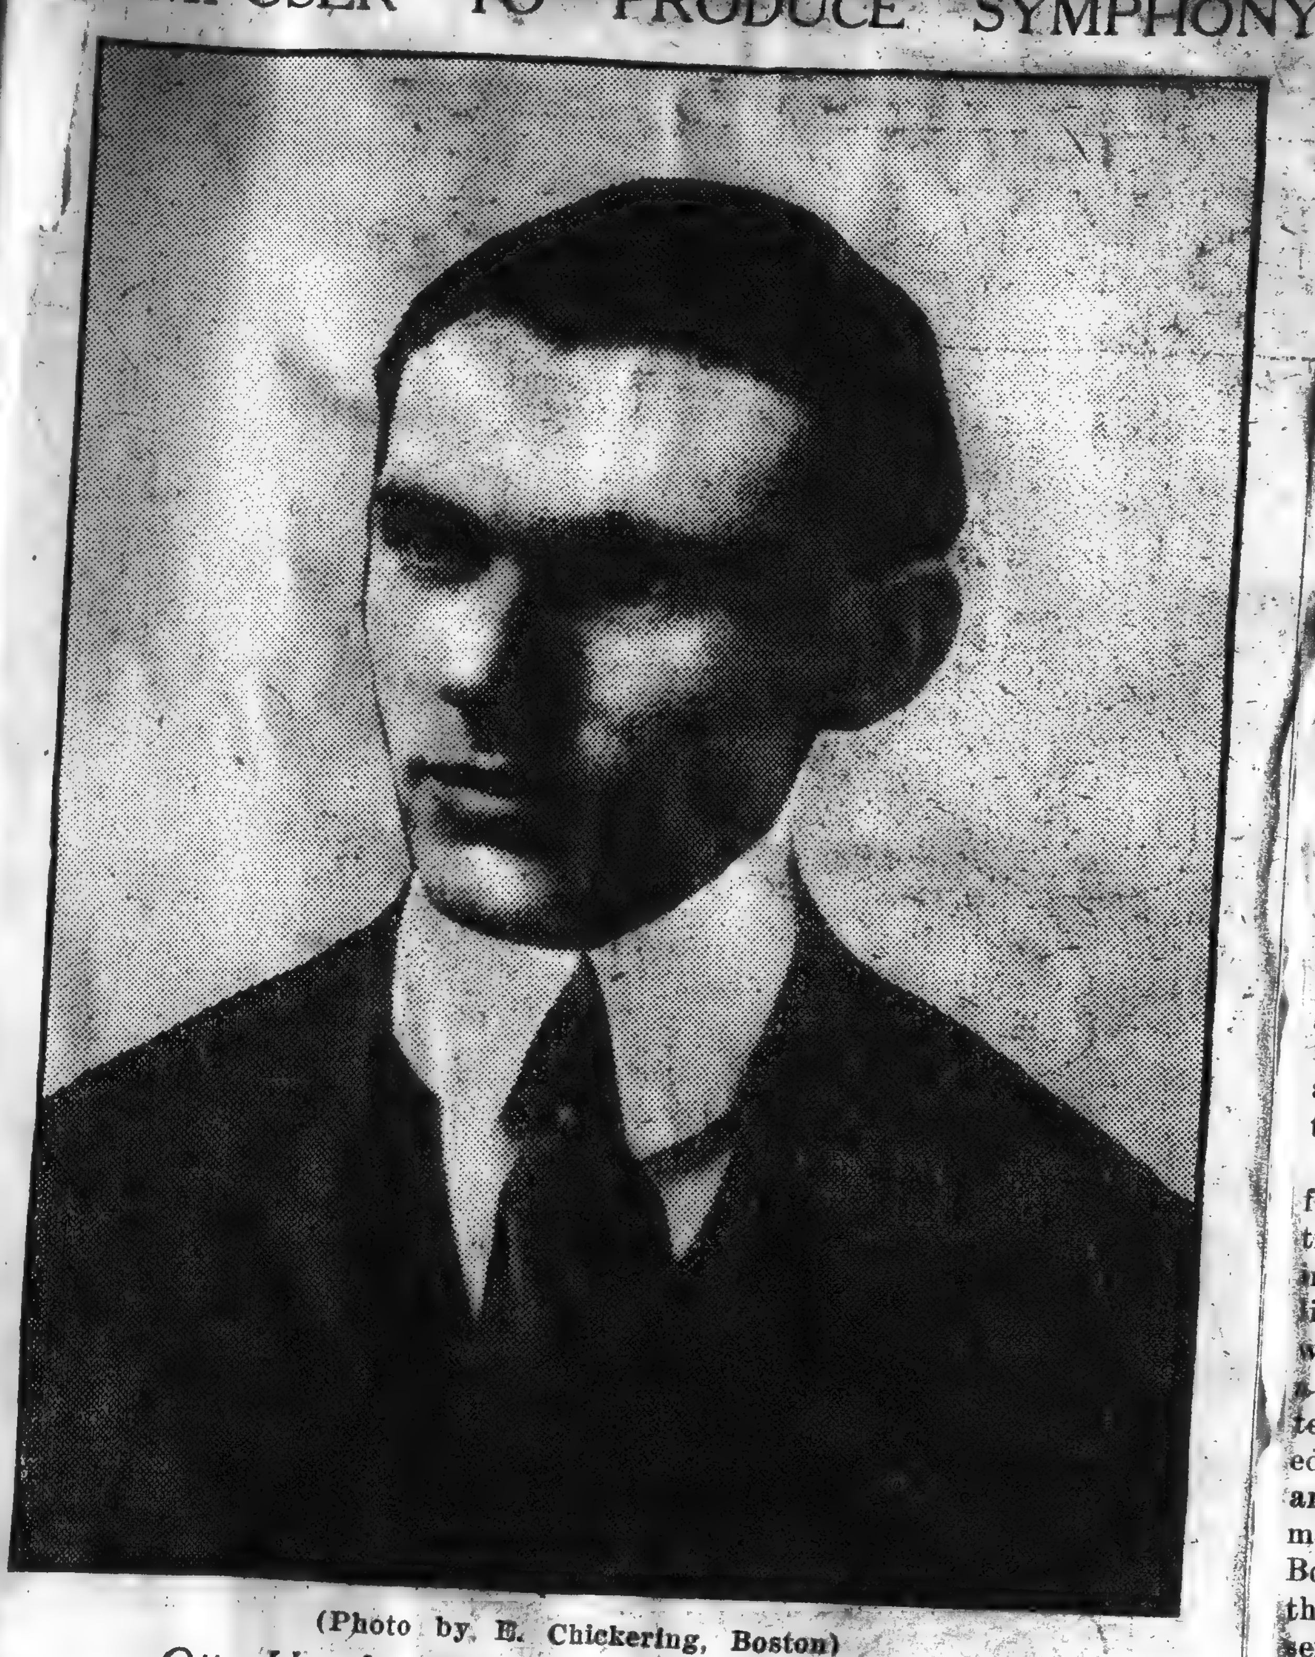
Six times within ten months—to count the performance of this evening—the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard Mahler's fifth symphony with every token of understanding, emotion and admiration. In the whole course of the concerts, it is probable that no symphony has been played so many times in so short a period to such responsive hearing. The inference is clear—that these same audiences would hear gladly other symphonies by Mahler, and especially the symphonies of his later years, to which the fifth was as a beginning. True, some of his symphonies, early and late, are for the time impossible at the Symphony Concerts because they exact a chorus, and because

Dr. Muck will not borrow one of amateurs, preferring to wait the day when the orchestra shall fulfil its manifest destiny and have a highly trained and disciplined professional chorus at its call. Other of Mahler's symphonies require no more than a solo voice which should be readily procurable, while yet others, like this same fifth, ask only an orchestra. It is true that those exacting a chorus most deserve a hearing and are most characteristic of Mahler but since circumstances deny Dr. Muck these, there is only the more reason why he should go on to those that lie wholly within his present resources of [illegible] chestra and solo voices. If he judges his public by its disposition toward the fifth symphony, it would welcome a symphony by Mahler each year as it now listens patiently to one by Bruckner. The conductors of our time—and Dr. Muck among them—count it one of their obligations to music to make Bruckner's symphonies known, appreciated, applauded. Double and triple fold a like obligation should bind them to play Mahler's. They will endure the test. Each repetition the more firmly establishes them.

[132]

ONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY

OMPOSER TO PRODUCE SYMPHONY



(Photo by E. Chickering, Boston)

Otto Urack will interpret his own work

Otto Urack, known for the past two seasons as assistant conductor of the Symphony orchestra and as one of the two solo violoncello players of the organization, will present himself at the public rehearsal of March 6 and at the concert of March 7 as a composer, when he will conduct from manuscript his symphony in E major, a work he has written since he came to Boston.

"I used the key of E," explained Mr. Urack in talking at his house with a Monitor caller, "because that is a tonality of sunshine and high color. It is a key that symphony composers, particularly those of classic days, neglected, but it is one that just suited my feeling. When I came to America I was earnestly considering the idea of composing an opera, for I had been hard at work as an opera conductor and I was deeply interested in the stage. But when I joined the Symphony orchestra my thoughts turned at once from that to the composition of a work in one of the concert forms. When I had opportunity to direct the orchestra I was so impressed with its brilliant and sonorous playing that I determined to write something or it. I felt that the most appropriate sentiment to express through such a wealth of tone was that of joy. And I at once began to sketch a symphony. I finished the sketch in a short time and had my work in shape to play on the piano in January of last year. I started to write the orchestration and worked at it for the rest of the season and during the summer, finishing it in October, 1913. I scored the last two movements and the trio of the scherzo during vacation in Germany. The rest of it I scored here."

The E major symphony is in strict classic form and is not written to a program. "There was something in me," commented Mr. Urack, as he went to the piano and opened the autograph score of his work, "to which I had to give sound and life. It was not anything in book, picture or nature that started me writing. I had an impulse to express myself in melody and I went ahead. Long and flowing themes, such as sing well in the solo voices of the orchestra, are my preference in music. Harmony I like well, but not, as so many composers of today do; for its own sake. Orchestral writers are inclined, according to my view, to exploit their theoretical knowledge too much and to neglect melodic idea."

Mr. Urack's work, as he turned the pages and played it over, proved to be in the regular four movements, with the slow movement second and the scherzo third. The opening division is the longest, requiring about 18 minutes in performance. The scherzo is comparatively short and the final movement is compact. Thematic development is carried out extensively in the opening allegro, according to the usual manner of symphony writers. But direct statement—concise paragraphing and rapid marshaling of thoughts characterize the [illegible]mposition. Unity [illegible] is attained by the systematic introduction throughout the piece of a motive which serves as first theme of the allegro. This is something more than the motto type of theme which the classic composers availed themselves of and something less than the characterizing melody with which the writers of symphonic poems have held their compositions together. It is inclined to speak up at moments of transition and to serve as bridge from one group of thoughts to the next. It is thus a means of artistic economy rather than of musical mechanics. It gives the impression that the composer is sticking to his main point but not that he is arbitrarily riveting all the portions of his work into a structural whole.

The first movement is characterized by the mood defined in Italian terminology as appassionato. The high point of the development comes when the two main themes are worked together with a third theme, the double quartet of French horns giving out a strain built from the chord of D, uncertain whether to declare themselves for the major or the minor. This passage is delivered with the full power of the orchestra and it is followed by a gentle song which gives assurance that an uncertainty is resolved. In the first movement there is original use of the harmonium with oboe and flute in solo passages.

The adagio is in D flat major and begins softly in the brass choir. Presently the violins enter. In the second part two solo violins and harmonium are heard. There is a return to the first theme, the strings taking in their upper range the melody which the horns had in tenor compass. Later the full orchestra presents it. There follows, by way of review, a passage in which first and second themes are worked together. The coda introduces a new idea. Themes of the first movement reappear softly at the close.

The scherzo, in E minor, three quarter time, is brilliant, swift and playful. It contains a trio with a singing theme which is constantly interrupted. One voice after another tries to take it up but is not allowed to carry it through, and truce is declared by a general return to the scherzo.

The last movement opens presto appassionato, and there are two themes. In the middle of the movement all the ideas of the symphony are assembled and toward the close the principal melody of the first movement is heard in the low voices as a sort of hymn. There is a sonorous close.

* * *

Women's Christian

Orchestra Matinee Audience Enthusiastic Over Mahler Fifth Symphony, Listening to It for Second Time Under Mr. Muck

WAGNER "IDYL" HEARD

Mahler's fifth symphony in C sharp minor, played for the second time this season, was the principal number on the program of the Symphony orchestra rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Its interpretation under the baton of Karl Muck held the attention of the house even closer than when it was given in the early part of the winter and there was such enthusiastic hand-clapping at the close that the players had to stand not only once but twice. The conductor himself joined in with the audience in applauding the artists, disclaiming the credit of the performance himself. There was but one other number on the program, the "Siegfried Idyl," and the playing of this was attended with the usual acclaim of Dr. Muck's Wagnerian selections.

There is now no question about the favor of Mahler with the Boston orchestral public. His music has won a place in the affections of Symphony concert listeners as firm apparently as that which the music of Richard Strauss held a few years ago. It would be an interesting contribution to social knowledge if somebody should carefully study and ascertain just what difference it makes in the artistic world that the Boston public has given its approval to the composer. Mahler's work was presented last season at the Symphony concerts doubtless for the reason that it was regarded by the conductor as good for the public to know. The enlightenment of Bostonians in the modern orchestral repertory would be incomplete without a performance of this vast composition, which had been presented to them but once before and then incompletely. Now that they have heard it in two successive years and twice in the present year at general request, it would be a significant piece of information for somebody to bring in, whether the record of performances and their acclaim make any impression outside of Boston and the cities of the Syhphony orchestra circuit.

* * *

On the program with Otto Urack's new symphony at the Symphony concerts of March 6 and 7 will be Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite (repeated by request) and Enesco's "Roumanian Rhapsody."

The program which Dr. Muck has chosen for the pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra on the afternoon of March 8 in Symphony hall consists of Wagnerian selections, as follows: Introduction to third act and dance of the apprentices from "Meistersinger"; Fichter's arrangement of portions of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," "Tannhaeuser" overture, "Lohengrin" prelude, "Siegfried Idyl" and "Kaisermarsch."

MONITOR, BOSTON

FEBRUARY 28, 1914

SYMPHONY LEA
BUYS A HO

Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, who has bou house at 50 Fenway, is said to ha for a permanent residence ever returned to Boston for his secgement with the orchestra in of 1912. Dr. Muck and Mrs. been living in an apartment waiting to find the building they It is understood that they will house ready for occupancy hey retur in Europe.

DR. KARL MUCK'S HOUSE

ARY TRANSCRIPT,

ARY 28, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REPETITIONS MAKE ANOTHER NEW PRECEDENT

Mahler's Symphony and the "Siegfried Idyl" Again — Dr. Muck's Innovations in American Routine — Mahler and Bruckner

FOR the first time within long recollections, the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was a concert of repetitions. That is to say, Mahler's fifth symphony, revived last April by Dr. Muck and the orchestra, and played again by them last November, was repeated yet once more in deference to requests—a hundred strong—that have come to the conductor. For after-piece, though the symphony in its demands upon players and hearers might well suffice for a whole concert, came Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," music that Dr. Muck cherishes and that he restored last year to the active repertory of the orchestra. Even the repetition of a novel piece in the season in which it is first played is a relatively rare procedure in symphony concerts in America. It is much commoner in Europe, where a new and, maybe, controverted symphony or tone-poem is sometimes played twice in a single concert. When a conductor does so he runs the risk of cloying his hearers with the piece and leaves them little time to sort out and clarify their first impressions. It seems wiser to defer the repetition for a time so that the audience may come again to the novel or the debated music still fresh to it and yet not altogether unacquainted with its [illegible]

ner. If the first hearing gave the listener pleasure then will he be glad to renew his satisfactions and add others to them. If the music baffled him, then he may return to be enlightened. If he resented it—as some resent ultra-modern music as though the innocent composer had designed it as a personal affront to them—then may he stay away or come, after the manner of men, to feed his resentment afresh.

During his first term as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts Dr. Muck occasionally ventured such repetitions—with Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Debussy's sea-pieces for example. When he returned he did not renew the excellent practice, perhaps because none of the "novelties" of last year quickened enough interest to warrant it. Last autumn he returned to it with a repetition of this same symphony of Mahler and a week hence he and the orchestra are to play again Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose," heard first at Christmas time and warmly liked. Between and in his usual unobtrusive fashion, Dr. Muck has set a new precedent in the concert of yesterday, with Mahler's symphony and Wagner's idyl, altogether a concert of repetitions of pieces that he has revived and carried to very eloquent performance. Mahler's mighty symphony has been plentifully described and discussed in this place; scarcely less has been said of the revealing, exalting and deeply moving performance that it receives at the conductor's and the orchestra's hands. That performance yesterday differed in no essential respect from its predecessors unless the conductor drew out too slowly the songful beauty of the slow movement.

One explanation of the slow pace that some conductors now use with Wagner's operas runs that he himself in the last days of his conducting in rehearsal at Baireuth so hung upon his own music, because in the emotion that welled within him he would draw the last drop from it. Yet when he had created that same music he had clearly designed it to move faster. On the edge of a similar pitfall, Dr. Muck seems to stand with the Adagietto of Mahler's symphony. When he first re-created it, the pace that he chose imparted and intensified the beauty of the contemplative and aspiring song. At each subsequent repetition, he has seemed by the impression of the ear, whether or not watch or metronome would verify it, to linger increasingly over it, Wagner-wise. The poise to which Dr. Muck keeps the delicate virtuosity of the orchestra in the "Siegfried Idyl" so that it never becomes a dry and finicking adeptness is not the least of the satisfactions of the present performance of it. With Mahler's adagietto, he himself imperils in another aspect that very poise.

Six times within ten months—to count the performance of this evening—the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard Mahler's fifth symphony with every token of understanding, emotion and admiration. In the whole course of the concerts, it is probable that no symphony has been played so many times in so short a period to such responsive hearing. The inference is clear—that these same audiences would hear gladly other symphonies by Mahler, and especially the symphonies of his later years, to which the fifth was as a beginning. True, some of his symphonies, early and late, are for the time impossible at the Symphony Concerts because they exact a chorus, and because

Dr. Muck will not borrow one of amateurs preferring to wait the day when the orchestra shall fulfil its manifest destiny and have a highly trained and disciplined professional chorus at its call. Others of Mahler's symphonies require no more than a solo voice which should be readily procurable, while yet others, like this same fifth, ask only an orchestra. It is true that those exacting a chorus most deserve a hearing and are most characteristic of Mahler but since circumstances deny Dr. Muck these, there is only the more reason why he should go on to those that lie wholly within his present resources of orchestra and solo voices. If he judges his public by its disposition toward the fifth symphony, it would welcome a symphony by Mahler each year as it now listens patiently to one by Bruckner. The conductors of our time—and Dr. Muck among them—count it one of their obligations to music to make Bruckner's symphonies known, appreciated, applauded. Double and triple-fold a like obligation should bind them to play Mahler's. They will endure the test. Each repetition the more firmly establishes them.

TRAVELER

FEBRUARY 28,

MAHLER'S BIG FIFTH SYMPHONY AGAIN

Mahler's monumental fifth symphony was repeated by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon as the result of many requests. Again Dr. Muck gave a superb performance and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. The work seems to become stronger, more fascinating with each hearing and its great length imposes less of a task on the listener's attention, despite the passages that are more or less dull. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," beautifully played, closed the program.

BOSTON JOURNAL

MARCH 7, 1914.

URACK CONDUCTS HIS OWN MUSIC

Symphony Audience Applauds Him Generously for His Efforts.

If Otto Urack ponders duly over the flattering tribute paid him yesterday at the close of the performance of his performance of his first symphony, he will profit immensely.

The tribute, it would seem, was largely due to the young man's position and ambition. At the age of 30 he is assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra; he has won a place for himself in Europe as a 'cellist; especially at Bayreuth, where he was 'cello soloist of the famous Festival Orchestra; he has been a conductor at the Royal Opera House in Berlin; he has coached some of the most distinguished opera singers of the day. Last season he conducted the Symphony Orchestra many times during the illneess of Dr. Muck, who has been as guide, philosopher and friend to him.

The symphony played yesterday was full of evidence of his talent and industry, but there was no mark of heaven-sent inspiration or originality. The scherzo had the most distinction—a tricksy, ingenious piece of writing, which was dashingly played and warmly applauded. The symphony is lyrical and episodical; it has many melodies loosely linked together, and some of the phrases sound like quotations from well-known authors. On the whole, the composition smacks of the classroom. The audience was generous in its appreciation of Mr. Urack's efforts, both as composer and conductor. It clapped him out many times at the end of the performance, which the orchestra gave with fraternal feeling.

Dr. Muck conducted the remainder of the program. Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," was heard for the first time in seven years. Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces, played earlier in the season, were repeated by request. The concert closed with a rousing performance of Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine."

Paderewski will be the solist next week. He will play his own concerto in A minor. Chadwick's third symphony and a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark will complete the program.

TRANSCRIPT,

, MARCH 7,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. URACK'S YOUNG AND HONEST MUSIC

A First Symphony, with Many Marks of Its Kind, and Something More Besides That Was Individual and Interesting — A Tone-Poem rfom Bohemia, Subtle Simplicities from Paris, and Fire from Roumania for the Rest of the Programme

AT thirty and after various service in German orchestras and opera houses, Mr. Urack has written a symphony which is characteristic of the years that he has lived and of the work that he has done. For the first time anywhere, it was played yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert—a distinc- en that envious composers and their ends will be quick to attribute to Mr. ck's position in the orchestra and to Muck's warm liking for him. Even in termission those who misliked the ny were saying that the production s one more sign—to be coupled with of the current season—of the y of "pull" in the ordering of oncerts. The saying was legree unjust; but re- [illegible] quarters as it has been within the last two months, it has its warning for those that control the Symphony Concerts. For long years, they have been accounted one of the few institutions in the music of America to which, usually, there was no other entry, for composer, singer or virtuoso, than proven merit. It is a standard no less to be preserved than the quality of the orchestra, the catholicity of the programmes or any other of the attendant glories that make the concerts and the band what they are. The mere hint of any departure from them, though it be only "in the air" and spiced with malice, is not good to hear. For as the concerts have unique standards, so have they inspired unique loyalties.

On the other hand, Mr. Urack's symphony gave as much pleasure to the audience as though it had been a masterpiece of contemporary music and probably a deal more. At the close of each movement, the composer, who conducted as well, was long and warmly applauded. At the end of the whole symphony he was as honestly, generally and insistently clapped. Unmistakably the audience liked the music and plausibly, for the very qualities that the learned and the exacting will reproach in it. Mr. Urack used often large orchestral sonorities in long and swelling progressions. They stirred the average hearer's ears. He set in contrast the clear song of a few instrumental voices and it piqued those same listeners. His melodies were frankly obvious and songful. Sometimes they were tunes naked and unashamed. They were easy to recognize and to follow in development and interplay and the audience rejoiced accordingly in a readily comprehensible and an honestly ingratiating symphony. Probably, it thought not at all of the many obvious sources of these melodies and of Mr. Urack's treatment of them as he worked them forward, as he robed them in harmonic and instrumental dress. These many years Mr. Urack has sat in the orchestras of concert halls and opera houses; he has conducted in many operas; with singers he has studied more. All the while he has been consciously noting or unconsciously absorbing all this music. When he came to compose a symphony for himself, to squeeze hard, as it were, thought and imagination, not a little that he had so acquired was bound to come forth—this time by unconscious process—with his own inventions. The hunter for "reminiscence" in Mr. Urack's music, will have easy sport, a full bag, and no doubt much self-complacence. Symphonies by young composers, who have been conductors too, are as dependable on this score as the shooting of driven pheasants in a royal battue.

Yet the actual point with such a new symphony is not the degree of "reminiscence" in it, which usually speaks for itself, but the degree of talent and individuality that it may disclose, besides, in the young composer. So scrutinized, Mr. Urack's music shows clear resource with harmonic and instrumental means. When he is not in the least "reminiscent," he weaves many-stranded, richly colored, elastic and significant harmonic backgrounds and his harmony is either the full-voiced or the sharp-set harmony that gives contemporary music no little of its diverse eloquence. He has, in his own right, a quick keen sense of instrumental timbres, individualized, assembled or contrasted, and he can use them, as he does in his Scherzo, with an imagination of his own. He knows his orchestra and he is no more insistent than most young composers are upon the superfluous sonorities of the organ or the needless italics of dissonance. His faculty of design hardly equals his instrumental and harmonic resource. His symphony hangs together and advances from beginning to end; he is even ingenious in the reappearances of a kind of motto melody; but here and there the jointure is slack and the progress hesitating until Mr. Urack, as it were, could take a long breath of invention again. He lacks, too, variety of means and method. He is too fond of the long, cumulating and sonorous ascent with all the voices of the orchestra in play and the quick subsidence into a few high-pitched instrumental whispers. He sometimes writes in rather stiff paragraphs. He is not always artful in transition. Simply as he uses the symphonic form, he is hardly at ease with it.

Behind this use of forms, ways and means lies a clear and interesting individuality that, so far as the symphony of yesterday went, was more negative than positive. On the side of invention, imagination and emotion, the music was more impressive for what it had not tried to be than for what it was. Mr. Urack's procedure—"reminiscences" and all the rest—was the anticipated procedure of a young conductor-composer writing a first symphony in this year of musical grace. Per contra, his invention and imagination took another course from that which these same composers usually pursue. There is nothing abstruse about Mr. Urack's music. It does not attempt to scale the shimmering heights of mystic elation or to sound the black depths of human woe. It is not in the least concerned with the cosmos. It is quite indifferent to the "time-spirit," whatever we may believe that to be. Mr. Urack is not even trying to show how different he can be from all others who write music and to go a step before the foremost in bizarre invention. He is actually writing orchestral song for its own sake that shall stir the ear and the imagination by the beauty of its own voice, by the emotion that plays through it. Full of this purpose, he has invented songful melodies, obvious and ingratiating and treated them as songfully. To some of us who are old, in this youthful honesty, in this youthful confidence in relatively simple things—rare enough nowadays in the making of music—lie the real promise and individuality of the symphony.

As yet, however, Mr. Urack's invention, imagination and emotion do not rise to the fine heights of his purpose. His melodies are songful; they have a momentary sensuous beauty, a passing warmth of emotion. They are not exactly commonplace; but they do want character. Mr. Urack is too prone to plaintiveness in his slow [illegible] tunes of his scherzo, to an [illegible] finale that is rather orchestral pomp around his melodies than the mounting impulse in them. Akin is his treatment. There is unmistakable fancy in the scherzo; clear emotion in the first two movements with their curious suggestions of an unwritten music-drama rather than of an "absolute" symphonic piece; and vigor and to spare in the finale. They all have a measure of straightforward eloquence; but an eloquence that lacks character. Through all the symphony the listener hears sympathetically but unmoved.

The rest of the concert ran a familiar and pleasurable course. Out of the pieces of his first time here, Dr. Muck took Smetana's tone-poem of the Bohemian citadel, and it made ruinous complement to Mr. Urack's symphony. Here, again, was music that sought a clear beauty and a simple eloquence, that the listener might comprehend and feel on the instant. Butwhereas Mr. Urack's music in similar kind, did no more than interest, Smetana's moved ear and imagination with its eloquence of image and emotion. The melody of the castle, sung with grave force by the orchestra, evoked the composer's vision and mood. The music, simple as it seems nowadays, summoned the chivalric pageantry, less as graphic tonal actualities than as memories recalled and lamented. Under Mr. Holy's hand, which adds imagination to technical perfection, the harp raised and dismissed the vision. In a word, Smetana's tone-poem had character wherever Mr. Urack's symphony lacked it.

From simplicity in and for itself, Dr. Muck went on to sophistication, achieving it by artful and hidden means. Possibly indeed that artfulness labelled Ravel's "Mother Goose," childlike pieces that the composers might put us in the mood to hear them. Certainly it concealed all those subtle economies of means, all that meticulous finesse with them, all that exact and pondering and eliminating felicity with which Ravel has written these little pieces. Quest for the flawless and irreproachable melody, phrase, rhythm, juxtaposition, transition, what you will, could hardly go farther or more patiently, and at the end the wonder is that such a pursuit of perfection should at last reach its goal, and not have dried the imaginative impulse that prompted the seeking. For lo! out of all this winowed invention and hidden artfulness rise the very motion of the pavane that dreamily they danced in the abode of the sleeping beauty the very wistfulness of the lost Hop-o'-my-Thumb and the very twitter of the unfeeling birds into it; the fantasy of the nodding little images winding about their porcelain empress to music spiced with Chinese harmonies like the Chinese colors upon them; the amorous prattle of coquettish Beauty with her sighing Beast, and last, as all in one, not merely the song, but the very illusion of fairy folk in their fairy garden. In its kind Ravel's music is a little miracle of fancy, prefectly expressed, of exhaustless subtlety seeming simplicity itself.

In a sense, Enesco's rhapsody was simplicity, too, though in quite another sense from that of Boston, Paris or Prague. The music, once heard in Mr. Fiedler's time; but with no such voice as Dr. Muck gave it yesterday, does no more than assemble Roumanian folk-tunes—or rather folk-dances—and lead them into the concert room in becoming order and properly clad harmonically and instrumentally. Conductor and men must do the rest—make the dhythms bite, make the pharses of transition and climax leap out as though by irresistible impulse, give the melodies their shrill piercing tang, keep the music goading itself fiercely and more fiercely, till it reels and shrieks in its own frenzy. When music is sophisticated scarcely a conductor compares with Dr. Muck in minute insight and imparting lucidity with it. When it is barbarian, as Enesco's was, he shares its frenzies as though they were in his blood. With either he makes his imagination and his means the expert and practised servants of his understanding and feeling. If he is manifold, he never ceases to be masterful.

H. T. P.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

, MARCH 7,

Matinee Listeners Give Their Applause to Assistant Conductor in First Presentation of Symphony in E Major

RAVEL HEARD AGAIN

Otto Urack, assistant conductor and one of the solo violincellists of the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed from manuscript his symphony in E major at its first performance Friday afternoon, winning the approbation of a large audience for his music and for his reading of it. His work was the first number on the program of the seventeenth public rehearsal of the orchestra. The other selections, one of which was a Ravel piece played earlier in the year and repeated by request, were conducted by Karl Muck. The program was as follows: Urack, symphony in E major, op. 14; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vysehrad;" Ravel, "Mother Goose" suite; Enesco, "Roumanian Rhapsody" in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

Mr. Urack has put into his symphony the all-important quality which so many composers who are trying to win a place for themselves beside Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Strauss fail to achieve, that of contrasting moods. Although he has accepted as a structural [illegible] the regular four-mov[illegible] form and has [illegible] to cling to a specific set of themes, he has managed to keep his feelings out of thraldom to his medium. He is grave and gay by turns just as though he were in conversation. He sticks so closely to his scheme of melodies that the listener can with ease recognize each one as it reappears but the song always seems to come in because the composer has a new sentiment to utter, not merely because the time has arrived for the music to take a new development. Theoretically considered, the symphony is logical in its progress from point to point, it is built on a systematic architectural plan, and yet the shifts from seriousness to laughter, the changes from earnest persuasion to laughing concession impress the hearer more than the artistic propriety of it all.

The symphony did not sound, it spoke. And herein lies the difference between an cademic composition and a living piece of music. The one proceeds with its organization of melodies and with its setting forth of intellectual, sentimental and humorous chapters in perfect order, aying just so much in each division, ermitting nothing to intrude on its thinking, nothing to break up its self-absorption, nothing to sober its laughter. The other starts out to talk philosophy and presently forgets itself and dreams or jokes. It starts out to attain romance or pathos and it falls into argument. It starts out to narrate a comedy episode and it delays the point with some word of serious, mayhap profound, comment.

Thus Beethoven in his fifth symphony undertakes to make a deep study of the manners of his time. And searchingly he begins. But he does not get far before he comes out with the declaration that society is just an organism held together by generosity and good nature. Later he is fain to brood over his times as one who is melancholy, and before he is fairly established in his meditation he is singing his epoch's triumph song. He would like to laugh at his fellow men, but first he must grant that they are honest and noble at heart. That done, he lets out his satire at them relentlessly.

Contrast, then, and even conflict of mood is the distinction of music that sinks into the consciousness of listeners. The form of it makes little difference. A modern piece does not have to be on the tone poem pattern to make its point. For the success of music is neither in architectonic method nor in any program of description or narration followed out. A work carries conviction when the composer's feelings absolutely control it. The composer may be Otto Urack just as well as Richard Strauss. The place of writing and of producing may just as well be Boston as Berlin.

The audience in Symphony hall Friday afternoon applauded every movement in the new work enthusiastically. It was perhaps aroused more sharply by the third division, the scherzo, than by any of the other three parts, though it was evidently pleased with the last movement. The scherzo would make an interesting selection on programs of popular orchestral concerts. The symphony would perhaps stand rescoring in parts, particularly at the very beginning, where the orchestration is coarse and toward the [illegible] where it is turgid. The novel effects of coloring attained by the combination of a light stop of the harmonium with the solo wood instruments had much charm. The parlor organ was a more interesting adjunct to Mr. Urack's orchestra than the concert organ. Fortunately neither was over-employed.

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 7, 1914.

ACK SYMPHONY AN IMPRESSIVE WORK

Young 'Cellist-Conductor Given Ovation.

Dr Muck Recreates the Charm Upon the Ravel "Mother Goose" Suite.

The program of the 17th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows:

Urack	Symphony in E major No. 1 First performance.
Smetana	"Vysehrad," symphonic poem
Ravel	"Mother Goose" suite
Enesco	Roumanian Rhapsodie op 11, No. 1

Mr Urack's symphony created a pronounced impression. The young 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra was recalled at least five times after he had led his new work at its first performance. He manifestly was touched at the open cordiality of his reception and the ardent and loyal response to him of the orchestra, and well he might have been. There is always beauty and a veil of sacred mystery in the moment when a young artist is launched in a career for which he shows indubitable and compelling gifts. This is Mr Urack's first symphony. In it he shows the promise of great things. It is of big caliber; it displays vision, grasp and enduring vitality. It contains noble and beautiful thoughts such as spring only from a well-tempered and well-stored mind, and it expresses them with the skill of a well graced craftsman.

Mr Urack has said through the program notes that he aimed to write "absolute" music, that which expressed no definite "program," but clamored within him for expression. Symphony has the virility and sincerity in creative work born of love. There is original, individual expression. None will deny the passing influence of Strauss, nor yet that more noticeable of Humperdinck, who was Mr Urack's teacher, nor most apparent of all—that of Wagner, but this is not so much mere adulation.

There have been more obvious allusions to Siegfried's sword motive than the opening theme of the first movement at once given out by 'celli and horns, a motive fragmentarily reechoed in the two following movements, and proclaimed in a sonorous and sweeping apotheosis. The cyclic element is not the only sign of logic and cohesiveness in form. There is congruity and relationship in the development of ideas without the loss of spontaneity and freshness of invention.

This in part is the outcome of themes which excite rather than cloud the imagination. Mr Urack is fond of flowing, curving phrases of melody. By his disposition of them he causes his orchestra to sing, and so display the varying color of the several choirs. The scheme of contrast in all the emotional values is well conceived in dynamics, in rhythm, in tempo, in harmonic as in orchestral color, and the organ is added in effective holding chords in the slow movement and again to swell the final triumphant climax. Throughout the ear retains its keenness, for there is variety as well as significance of expression. There is some abruptness in the transitions from one period to another in the first movement—in the scherzo it fits the mood of rustic gayety—but the first climax is prepared and built up with a sure hand, while the decline from it is not less able.

The contrast in rhythmic devices is effective. Themes of similar emotional character do not follow each other. Harmonically the structure is conservative without archaism. A diatonic scale prevails, with passing allusion to the scale of the augmented triad. There is also a trace of Wagnerian chromatics.

From a first hearing, the material in the second section of the first movement is among the most vital in the symphony, the most pregnant in ideas and the most effectively worked out. The development shows good invention, and the first warning in the low-voiced horn, and then in the English horn, of the returning chief theme is cleverly managed.

The slow movement is built on a hymn-like theme bordering on the sentimental, chanted by the brass. The scherzo might mirror a gay country scene. There is suggestion of a peasant waltz, and there is rough jollity and sly humor. The last movement is launched by another theme resembling the chief subject of the first, but weaker, and again exposed by the 'cellos and horns—a favorite blend with Mr Urack. The work would have been one to excite admiration and praise from the pen of an older man. There are doubtless points wherein clearness suffers that Mr Urack will change, but it is worthy of a place in the repertory and an early rehearing.

Dr Muck again wove a spell of the child's fairy world about Ravel's exquisite little pieces. Smetana's music is obvious, but it has a rugged fiber that springs from the soil.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 7.

SYMPHONY OF MR. URACK SUCCEEDS

COMPOSER CONDUCTED AND MEN PLAYED LOVINGLY

Author Does Not Write Tonal Puzzles, and Audience Was Enthusiastic.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Urack	Symphony in E major. Op. 14
Smetana	Symphonic Poem. "Vysehrad"
Ravel	Mother Goose Melodies
Enesco	Roumanian Rhapsody

There was no soloist, but the second part of the list was not one of the very greatest orchestral programmes, such as we sometimes get at the Symphony concerts, and which make us wish for the permanent banishment of star vocalists, and other musical phenomenons, from the course. Mr. Urack is very popular among the men of the orchestra, and they played his symphony with an enthusiasm born of friendship, all the more so since the composer conducted his own composition.

Work Logically Coherent.

We were at once impressed by the fact that Mr. Urack is a master of modern scoring. Not that he pushed this into extremes, but he brought out good, sonorous effects, and was never muddy or unclear in his tone-coloring. He did not go into extremes of length either. Nowadays one may be very thankful when a symphonic composer finishes within the hour, and this work ran to about three-quarters of that limit. It was not (for this relief much thanks!) a formless creation of the extreme radical school. It is not expected of the 20th century composer that he shall follow the Mozart model: even Brahms, the bulwark of modern classical music, did not do this; but there was logical coherency in Mr. Urack's work, and an avoidance of the vagueness and the ascetic ugliness that is the hall-mark of too much modern orchestral music. The four movements of regular symphony were clearly enough presented, and the contrasts between the movements were in the main effective. Melody was not scorned either, and Mr. Urack did not despise thirds and sixths upon occasion.

It is a fortunate thing for a composer to belong to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If he lived in Germany his works might at the most receive a local performance the echoes of which would scarcely reach to the large cities and great musical organizations. Here the same composer has his work given with sympathetic care by the chief orchestra of the world and if it wins success it travels with that orchestra from city to city. This may be hampered a little in the present case, however, by the fact that a pipe organ is an important instrument in the score. The combination of this instrument with harp, in the first movement is a very effective tone-color.

The New Symphony.

The first movement is the longest, the most ingenious and the most ambitious of the symphony, but there is a certain homogeneity attained by transferring thematic material from the first movement through the others. The opening theme is heard in every part of the work. Another good combination is made with the organ, in the second movement, by combining it with two solo violins, and in the broad climaxes the organ was nobly effective.

The Scherzo will probably be the most popular movement, and there is some idealization of folk-dance in this part of the work that calls for hearty praise. Slices of popular dances did not vulgarize the movement in the least. The hurly-burly of gaiety here impressed us as if the second act of "La Boheme" had been done in a symphonic mould and translated into German.

It was a great pleasure to discover in Mr. Urack a modern composer who strives for beauty and does not write tonal puzzles. At times, in the finale, one could hear a modernized Mendelssohn.

It was no wonder, therefore, that the symphony scored an instantaneous and emphatic success, and the young composer was recalled again and again with great enthusiasm. We head a general request that the work be played again this season.

The Other Numbers.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" wears well. We should not be surprised if finally Smetana obtained precedence of his great pupil, Dvorak, who for a long time has seemed to eclipse him. Smetana will become better recognized as the years go on, and the first step towards that consummation is to teach people to pronounce his name aright. "Smetana" (which means "Cream" in Bohemian) is accented upon the first syllable, not upon the second, as so many musicians give it.

Dr. Muck read the work nobly, giving to it the lofty heroism and the bardic enthusiasm that Smetana undoubtedly desired in his set of patriotic, Bohemian tone-poems. The contrast of the broad sweeps of power, and the sense of desolation when the vision has vanished, was sharply drawn and was very effective.

Ravel's pieces for children were repeated by general request, but perhaps that General was not higher in rank than a Major. The children for whom these works were intended must have been of the type of young Erich Korngold, or of that child conductor, aged eight, who is at present in Russia leading a large orchestra in Wagnerian scores. Such children are of the type that can compose their own cradle songs, arrange them for orchestra, and conduct them too. But we found more to enjoy in these compositions than upon the first hearing, a short time ago. It is quite possible that we may "first endure, then pity, then embrace." Yet we still think that Schumann came much nearer to child-life than Ravel is doing. If Mother Goose is to be translated by such ad- [illegible] pictures, [illegible] change the text also. How would it do to give the time-honored poems something like this:—

"Johannes Horner sat within the room's sharp angle,
A Christmas pie he had begun to mangle.
A sudden twist, and now his thumb contracted,
A sudden pull, and lo, a plum extracted!"

When Mother Goose is put together in such fashion, one may expect infantile tone-pictures worked out on the Ravel plan, but scarcely until then.

But we found a dainty delicacy and a playful humor in some of the numbers, and were particularly impressed with the quaint and spicy vein of "Laideronnette."

The concert ended with a Roumanian Rhapsody which was "de trop," since the concert was quite long enough without it.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 7. 1914.

RAVEL'S SUITE IS REPEATED BY DR. MUCK

Exquisite Performance of the Charmingly Fantastical "Mother Goose."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was a smaller audience than is customary. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 1 (MS.)	Urack
Symphonic Poem, "Vy Sehrad"	Smetana
"Mother Goose": suite	Ravel
Roumanian Rhapsody, No. 1	Enesco

The feature of this concert was the exquisite performance of Ravel's charmingly fantastical suite. The suite was produced here by Dr. Muck at the end of last December and was played again in answer to many requests. The apparent simplicity of this music may lead some to regard the five movements as only pleasing trifles, and others may think that the orchestra had an easy task.

As a matter of fact, the suite is exceedingly difficult and requires the utmost nicety of expression. Nor are these movements only the result of a well equipped musician amusing himself. They show a rare sense of color, delicate playfulness, true fancy and masterly technic in composition. With an unusually small orchestra—small except for the pulsatile instruments used in "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes"—Ravel works wonders. There are more musical ideas in these little movements than are to be found in many ponderous and thunderous modern symphonies and symphonic poems.

It was a pleasure to hear Smetana's stately "Vysehrad" again, with its bardic songs, its reminders of the citadel's ancient glory. There was a brilliant performance of Enesco's Rhapsody, brought out here two years ago by Mr. Fiedler, and missed yesterday by those who left the hall for tea and tango or a surburban train. The concert unfortunately was too long.

Mr. Urack conducted his own symphony, which, composed in 1912-[illegible], was played yesterday for the first time. Seldom has a new work of such proportions been so enthusiastically received in Symphony Hall, and yet we believe that Mr. Urack ten years from now will burn the score—or keep it as a reminder that he, too, is mortal. It is easy to see why the audience applauded vigorously. The symphony is full of tunes—and Vernon Blackburn once defined a tune as a melody that is over ripe. Some of these tunes were by men who thoughtlessly preceded Mr. Urack. Or it might be said that Mr. Urack remembered their melodies and turned them into tunes. Too often he succeeded in vulgarizing the thoughts of his predecessors.

We are told that in Barmen he conducted 87 operatic performances and among them all of Wagner's music dramas. He has conducted symphony concerts. He has played as violincellist in operatic and concert performances. His symphony shows all this. There are reminiscences of "The Ring." Debussy's Faun is heard in at least two movements. There are suggestions also—let us be courteous—of Bruckner, and there are hints at Tschaikowsky. Nor has a favorite formula of Puccini—one of his own invention—escaped the vigilant eyes and ears of Mr. Urack.

We do not accuse Mr. Urack of plagiarism; we do not suspect him of it. Necessarily and closely acquainted with much music, his thoughts have been influenced by others. But he should surely recognize motives and moods of Wagner in his symphony, especially in the first movement; and no one could fail to be reminded more than once of Debussy's "L'Apresmidi d'un Faun." In the second movement, an Adagio, we find a treatment of the brass that was hitherto peculiar to Bruckner. In spite of reminiscences, these movements are the best in the work.

It is true that Mr. Urack works his first theme to death; that the structure of the first movement is loose; that there is a lack of contrast and logically effective thematic development. It is true that in the second movement there is much that is banal. The organ is introduced chiefly to swell the din—and a fortissimo with the aid of an organ always excites an audience, even when it is constitutionally phlegmatic. Nevertheless, whatever originality there is in these movements is of a much higher order than that disclosed in the following Sch[illegible] [illegible] devices, the [illegible] cheap and vulgar [illegible] at surprising instrumentation, [illegible] are not cleverly contrived. The [illegible] are of the lower operetta species. We do not object to this music because it is light. We object to it because it is neither graceful nor sparkling. There are pages in this Scherzo that remind us of strolling musicians in the court of an apartment house on a holiday, playing "anything that comes out," while they watch anxious the windows.

The finale shows a lack of constructive skill, nor is the melodic vein of fine or impressive quality. The more sentimental theme is of the Liedertafel—in the village variety. There are crude modulatory passages. The sections are not firmly knit together. All through the symphony there is the evidence of experiments in orchestration; seldom is an original thought clad becomingly in orchestral dress.

The program next week will be as follows: Chadwick, Symphony No. 3, in F major; Rubin Goldmark, Tone Poem "Samson" (ms. first performance); Paderewiski, Concerto in A minor for piano (Mr. Paderewski, pianist).

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 9, 1914

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Heard in Wagner Programme

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall a Wagner programme was presented by Dr. Muck and his men. Like the programme given at the Boston Opera House in the evening, the concert commenced with the "Tannhauser" overture. There followed the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the introduction to Act 3; the "Dance of the Apprentices," the "Entrance of the Meistersingers" and "Homage to Hans Sachs," from "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg"; also music from "Die Gotterdammerung," in Richter's concert arrangement; also the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Kaisermarsch."

Needless to say, this music was given well nigh faultless interpretations. In addition to the conductor's exceptional standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music, there was the remarkable orchestra which he made to supplement his efforts. Notable was the clarity and the nobility of tone in the Tannhauser and Lohengrin introductions. The Meistersinger music was read with exceptional brilliancy, with a vividness and comprehension that were little short of revelations. There was again proof of the symphonic quality of Wagner's music. In spite of its close relation to the drama, it is also music that stands alone by itself, on its own feet. It is nearly as effective in the concert hall as in the opera house. With the great orchestra demanded by the excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Gotterdammerung" the effects of color and sonority were simply superb.

No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic. It is not often that the public is given the opportunity of hearing such magnificent music making. The public availed itself of the privilege and showed by its absorbed attention and its resounding applause that it was appreciative of its blessings. This was the last pension fund concert of this season.

[134]

BOSTON GLOBE

MARCH 7, 1914.

ACK SYMPHONY AN IMPRESSIVE WORK

Young 'Cellist-Conductor Given Ovation.

Dr Muck Recreates the Charm Upon the Ravel "Mother Goose" Suite.

The program of the 17th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows:

Urack..........Symphony in E major No. 1
First performance.
Smetana.........."Vysehrad," symphonic poem
Ravel.................."Mother Goose" suite
Enesco.....Roumanian Rhapsodie op 11, No. 1

Mr Urack's symphony created a pronounced impression. The young 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra was recalled at least five times after he had led his new work at its first performance. He manifestly was touched at the open cordiality of his reception and the ardent and loyal response to him of the orchestra, and well he might have been. There is always beauty and a veil of sacred mystery in the moment when a young artist is launched in a career for which he shows indubitable and compelling gifts. This is Mr Urack's first symphony. In it he shows the promise of great things. It is of big caliber; it displays vision, grasp and enduring vitality. It contains noble and beautiful thoughts such as spring only from a well-tempered and well-stored mind, and it expresses them with the skill of a well graced craftsman.

Mr Urack has said through the program notes that he aimed to write "absolute" music, that which expressed no definite "program," but clamored within him for expression. Symphony has the virility and sincerity in creative work born of love. There is original, individual expression. None will deny the passing influence of Strauss, nor yet that more noticeable of Humperdinck, who was Mr Urack's teacher, nor most apparent of all—that of Wagner, but this is not so much mere adulation.

There have been more obvious allusions to Siegfried's sword motive than the opening theme of the first movement at once given out by 'celli and horns, a motive fragmentarily reechoed in the two following movements, and proclaimed in a sonorous and sweeping apotheosis. The cyclic element is not the only sign of logic and cohesiveness in form. There is congruity and relationship in the development of ideas without the loss of spontaneity and freshness of invention.

This in part is the outcome of themes which excite rather than cloud the imagination. Mr Urack is fond of flowing, curving phrases of melody. By his disposition of them he causes his orchestra to sing, and so display the varying color of the several choirs. The scheme of contrast in all the emotional values is well conceived in dynamics, in rhythm, in tempo, in harmonic as in orchestral color, and the organ is added in effective holding chords in the slow movement and again to swell the final triumphant climax. Throughout the ear retains its keenness, for there is variety as well as significance of expression. There is some abruptness in the transitions from one period to another in the first movement—in the scherzo it fits the mood of rustic gayety—but the first climax is prepared and built up with a sure hand, while the decline from it is not less able.

The contrast in rhythmic devices is effective. Themes of similar emotional character do not follow each other. Harmonically the structure is conservative without archaism. A diatonic scale prevails, with passing allusion to the scale of the augmented triad. There is also a trace of Wagnerian chromatics.

From a first hearing, the material in the second section of the first movement is among the most vital in the symphony, the most pregnant in ideas and the most effectively worked out. The development shows good invention, and the first warning in the low-voiced horn, and then in the English horn, of the returning chief theme is cleverly managed.

The slow movement is built on a hymn-like theme bordering on the sentimental, chanted by the brass. The scherzo might mirror a gay country scene. There is suggestion of a peasant waltz, and there is rough jollity and sly humor. The last movement is launched by another theme resembling the chief subject of the first, but weaker, and again exposed by the 'cellos and horns—a favorite blend with Mr Urack. The work would have been one to excite admiration and praise from the pen of an older man. There are doubtless points wherein clearness suffers that Mr Urack will change, but it is worthy of a place in the repertory and an early rehearing.

Dr Muck again wove a spell of the child's fairy world about Ravel's exquisite little pieces. Smetana's music is obvious, but it has a rugged fiber that springs from the soil.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 7.

SYMPHONY OF MR. URACK SUCCEEDS

COMPOSER CONDUCTED AND MEN PLAYED LOVINGLY

Author Does Not Write Tonal Puzzles, and Audience Was Enthusiastic.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Urack..............Symphony in E major. Op. 14
Smetana..........Symphonic Poem. "Vysehrad"
Ravel......................Mother Goose Melodies
Enesco.........................Roumanian Rhapsody

There was no soloist, but the second part of the list was not one of the very greatest orchestral programmes, such as we sometimes get at the Symphony concerts, and which make us wish for the permanent banishment of star vocalists, and other musical phenomenons, from the course. Mr. Urack is very popular among the men of the orchestra, and they played his symphony with an enthusiasm born of friendship, all the more so since the composer conducted his own composition.

Work Logically Coherent.

We were at once impressed by the fact that Mr. Urack is a master of modern scoring. Not that he pushed this into extremes, but he brought out good, sonorous effects, and was never muddy or unclear in his tone-coloring. He did not go into extremes of length either. Nowadays one may be very thankful when a symphonic composer finishes within the hour, and this work ran to about three-quarters of that limit. It was not (for this relief much thanks!) a formless creation of the extreme radical school. It is not expected of the 20th century composer that he shall follow the Mozart model: even Brahms, the bulwark of modern classical music, did not do this; but there was logical coherency in Mr. Urack's work, and an avoidance of the vagueness and the ascetic ugliness that is the hall-mark of too much modern orchestral music. The four movements of regular symphony were clearly enough presented, and the contrasts between the movements were in the main effective. Melody was not scorned either, and Mr. Urack did not despise thirds and sixths upon occasion.

It is a fortunate thing for a composer to belong to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If he lived in Germany his works might at the most receive a local performance the echoes of which would scarcely reach to the large cities and great musical organizations. Here the same composer has his work given with sympathetic care by the chief orchestra of the world and if it wins success it travels with that orchestra from city to city. This may be hampered a little in the present case, however, by the fact that a pipe organ is an important instrument in the score. The combination of this instrument with harp, in the first movement is a very effective tone-color.

The New Symphony.

The first movement is the longest, the most ingenious and the most ambitious of the symphony, but there is a certain homogeneity attained by transferring thematic material from the first movement through the others. The opening theme is heard in every part of the work. Another good combination is made with the organ, in the second movement, by combining it with two solo violins, and in the broad climaxes the organ was nobly effective.

The Scherzo will probably be the most popular movement, and there is some idealization of folk-dance in this part of the work that calls for hearty praise. Slices of popular dances did not vulgarize the movement in the least. The hurly-burly of gaiety here impressed us as if the second act of "La Boheme" had been done in a symphonic mould and translated into German.

It was a great pleasure to discover in Mr. Urack a modern composer who strives for beauty and does not write tonal puzzles. At times, in the finale, one could hear a modernized Mendelssohn.

It was no wonder, therefore, that the symphony scored an instantaneous and emphatic success, and the young composer was recalled again and again with great enthusiasm. We head a general request that the work be played again this season.

The Other Numbers.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" wears well. We should not be surprised if finally Smetana obtained precedence of his great pupil, Dvorak, who for a long time has seemed to eclipse him. Smetana will become better recognized as the years go on, and the first step towards that consummation is to teach people to pronounce his name aright. "Smetana" (which means "Cream" in Bohemian) is accented upon the first syllable, not upon the second, as so many musicians give it.

Dr. Muck read the work nobly, giving to it the lofty heroism and the bardic enthusiasm that Smetana undoubtedly desired in his set of patriotic, Bohemian tone-poems. The contrast of the broad sweeps of power, and the sense of desolation when the vision has vanished, was sharply drawn and was very effective.

Ravel's pieces for children were repeated by general request, but perhaps that General was not higher in rank than a Major. The children for whom these works were intended must have been of the type of young Erich Korngold, or of that child conductor, aged eight, who is at present in Russia leading a large orchestra in Wagnerian scores. Such children are of the type that can compose their own cradle songs, arrange them for orchestra, and conduct them too. But we found more to enjoy in these compositions than upon the first hearing, a short time ago. It is quite possible that we may "first endure, then pity, then embrace." Yet we still think that Schumann came much nearer to child-life than Ravel is doing. If Mother Goose is to be translated by such ad- [illegible] tone-pictures, [illegible] change the text also. How would it do to give the time-honored poems something like this:—

"Johannes Horner sat within the room's sharp angle,
A Christmas pie he had begun to mangle.
A sudden twist, and now his thumb contracted,
A sudden pull, and lo, a plum extracted!"

When Mother Goose is put together in such fashion, one may expect infantile tone-pictures worked out on the Ravel plan, but scarcely until then.

But we found a dainty delicacy and a playful humor in some of the numbers, and were particularly impressed with the quaint and spicy vein of "Laideronnette."

The concert ended with a Roumanian Rhapsody which was "de trop," since the concert was quite long enough without it.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 7. 1914.

RAVEL'S SUITE IS REPEATED BY DR. MUCK

Exquisite Performance of the Charmingly Fantastical "Mother Goose."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was a smaller audience than is customary. The program was as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 1 (MS.)..Urack
Symphonic Poem, "Vy Sehrad"...Smetana
"Mother Goose": suite...............Ravel
Roumanian Rhapsody, No. 1.....Enesco

The feature of this concert was the exquisite performance of Ravel's charmingly fantastical suite. The suite was produced here by Dr. Muck at the end of last December and was played again in answer to many requests. The apparent simplicity of this music may lead some to regard the five movements as only pleasing trifles, and others may think that the orchestra had an easy task.

As a matter of fact, the suite is exceedingly difficult and requires the utmost nicety of expression. Nor are these movements only the result of a well equipped musician amusing himself. They show a rare sense of color, delicate playfulness, true fancy and masterly technic in composition. With an unusually small orchestra—small except for the pulsatile instruments used in "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes"—Ravel works wonders. There are more musical ideas in these little movements than are to be found in many ponderous and thunderous modern symphonies and symphonic poems.

It was a pleasure to hear Smetana's stately "Vysehrad" again, with its bardic songs, its reminders of the citadel's ancient glory. There was a brilliant performance of Enesco's Rhapsody, brought out here two years ago by Mr. Fiedler, and missed yesterday by those who left the hall for tea and tango or a surburban train. The concert unfortunately was too long.

Mr. Urack conducted his own symphony, which, composed in 1912-13, was played yesterday for the first time. Seldom has a new work of such proportions been so enthusiastically received in Symphony Hall, and yet we believe that Mr. Urack ten years from now will burn the score—or keep it as a reminder that he, too, is mortal. It is easy to see why the audience applauded vigorously. The symphony is full of tunes—and Vernon Blackburn once defined a tune as a melody that is over ripe. Some of these tunes were by men who thoughtlessly preceded Mr. Urack. Or it might be said that Mr. Urack remembered their melodies and turned them into tunes. Too often he succeeded in vulgarizing the thoughts of his predecessors.

We are told that in Barmen he conducted 87 operatic performances and among them all of Wagner's music dramas. He has conducted symphony concerts. He has played as violincellist in operatic and concert performances. His symphony shows all this. There are reminiscences of "The Ring." Debussy's Faun is heard in at least two movements. There are suggestions also —let us be courteous—of Bruckner, and there are hints at Tschaikowsky. Nor has a favorite formula of Puccini—one of his own invention—escaped the vigilant eyes and ears of Mr. Urack.

We do not accuse Mr. Urack of plagiarism; we do not suspect him of it. Necessarily and closely acquainted with much music, his thoughts have been influenced by others. But he should surely recognize motives and moods of Wagner in his symphony, especially in the first movement; and no one could fail to be reminded more than once of Debussy's "L'Apresmidi d'un Faun." In the second movement, an Adagio, we find a treatment of the brass that was hitherto peculiar to Bruckner. In spite of reminiscences, these movements are the best in the work.

It is true that Mr. Urack works his first theme to death; that the structure of the first movement is loose; that there is a lack of contrast and logically effective thematic development. It is true that in the second movement there is much that is banal. The organ is introduced chiefly to swell the din—and a fortissimo with the aid of an organ always excites an audience, even when it is constitutionally phlegmatic. Nevertheless, whatever originality there is in these movements is of a much higher order than that disclosed in the following Sch[illegible] [illegible] certain effective rhythmic devices, the Scherzo is exceedingly cheap and vulgar. There are attempts at surprising instrumentation, but they are not cleverly contrived. The tunes are of the lower operetta species. We do not object to this music because it is light. We object to it because it is neither graceful nor sparkling. There are pages in this Scherzo that remind us of strolling musicians in the court of an apartment house on a holiday, playing "anything that comes out," while they watch anxious the windows.

The finale shows a lack of constructive skill, nor is the melodic vein of fine or impressive quality. The more sentimental theme is of the Liedertafel—in the village variety. There are crude modulatory passages. The sections are not firmly knit together. All through the symphony there is the evidence of experiments in orchestration; seldom is an original thought clad becomingly in orchestral dress.

The program next week will be as follows: Chadwick, Symphony No. 3, in F major; Rubin Goldmark, Tone Poem "Samson" (ms. first performance); Paderewiski, Concerto in A minor for piano (Mr. Paderewski, pianist).

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 9, 1914

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Symphony Heard in Wagner Programme

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall a Wagner programme was presented by Dr. Muck and his men. Like the programme given at the Boston Opera House in the evening, the concert commenced with the "Tannhauser" overture. There followed the prelude to "Lohengrin"; the introduction to Act 3, the "Dance of the Apprentices," the "Entrance of the Meistersingers" and "Homage to Hans Sachs," from "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg"; also music from "Die Gotterdammerung," in Richter's concert arrangement; also the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Kaisermarsch."

Needless to say, this music was given well nigh faultless interpretations. In addition to the conductor's exceptional standing as an interpreter of Wagner's music, there was the remarkable orchestra which he made to supplement his efforts. Notable was the clarity and the nobility of tone in the Tannhauser and Lohengrin introductions. The Meistersinger music was read with exceptional brilliancy, with a vividness and comprehension that were little short of revelations. There was again proof of the symphonic quality of Wagner's music. In spite of its close relation to the drama, it is also music that stands alone by itself, on its own feet. It is nearly as effective in the concert hall as in the opera house. With the great orchestra demanded by the excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Gotterdammerung" the effects of color and sonority were simply superb.

No wonder that the audience was enthusiastic. It is not often that the public is given the opportunity of hearing such magnificent music making. The public availed itself of the privilege and showed by its absorbed attention and its resounding applause that it was appreciative of its blessings. This was the last pension fund concert of this season.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 7, 1914

SYMPHONY BY URACK LAUNCHED

First Serious Work of 'Cellist Given Reading

BY OLIN DOWNES

[illegible] novelty on the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon [illegible] Symphony Hall was a "Symphony No. 1" by Otto Urack, 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Out of the depths of a full heart—and a full orchestra—Mr. Urack composed his symphony. His ears were filled with the glorious tone of one of the finest orchestrations in the world. He composed his symphony, and enjoyed the advantage which a young man of 30 may well prize, of conducting his composition and utilizing to the full the utmost resources of the greatest of instruments.

GENEROUS APPLAUSE

It is the merest fairness to Mr. Urack to record the fact that his symphony was exceedingly successful. Not the fourth symphony of Sibelius, one of the most prophetic works in the modern literature of the orchestra; not the "Iberia" of Debussy, wonderfully beautiful as it is; not the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss, which have been so successful with Symphony audiences. There was long continued applause after every movement of Mr. Urack's work, and at the end of the symphony the audience was loth to let the composer go. No wonder that he was gratified at such a reception, and it was a pleasant thing to see a musician receive such encouragement, so soon in his career.

But surely Mr. Urack is aware, as were the more experienced listeners present, of the shortcomings of his symphony. Its virtues may be easily and clearly set forth. He has written with unmistakable enthusiasm, with a very considerable knowledge of the orchestra. He has written clearly and without dawdling over his ideas. His contagious enthusiasm was to be felt, even in the most banal and unoriginal moments.

Lack of Originality

This leads us to a principal and important defect: the almost total lack of originality in the thematic material. Wagner, Strauss, Puccini, modern Frenchmen, are jumbled together in this score. Not only themes, but instrumental effects are lifted almost bodily from the compositions with which Mr. Urack is familiar. The sonorities of Strauss, the brass of Bruckner, a certain after-climax in the Tannhauser overture—these effects, not to be a purist, or a pedant, or a spitefully critical person, were inescapable allusions to the works of other men.

Moreover, the orchestration, brilliant as it is, has the fault common to most composers in their earlier stages of development: it is too noisy; and, with all its effects, there is not sufficient simplicity and genuine variety and contrast of sonorities. The full orchestra works for dear life, and it makes a splendid sound, with the celesta, the two harps, the brass, the organ, and many other instruments which the composer employs.

Slow Movement Effective

The slow movement of this symphony is based upon a Bruckner-like theme treated as a song, and, considering the simplicity of the treatment and the constant reiterations of the theme, it may be said that it is treated with promising resource. That is, without employing variations of the original idea sufficiently complex to lead the hearer far afield, the theme itself does not become monotonous. The curve of the melody is wholly without originality, but the melody itself is treated with a freshness and resource which are innate with the composer.

Of the scherzo as much cannot be said. It is either cheap or labored. There is a suggestion of a Brucknerish figure for the opening measures. The second strain is a pretty commonplace waltz tune, effectively orchestrated. The finale is remarkable chiefly for the form and brilliance of its conclusion.

Emphasizes His Zeal

The directness of Mr. Urack's writing, the naivete which does not permit of his easily deceiving his scorer, bear witness to his zeal as a musician, and [illegible] that his superabundant and needless employment of many instruments was intended a bait to his public. As any composer, confronted for the first time with an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony might do, he has written in a manner to employ all instruments and much effective virtuosity on the part of the players. But he himself will surely recognize the inherent poverty of his piece, and compose less hastily his second work of symphonic dimensions. He should go slowly; he should not mistake instrumental color or noise for ideas; he should endeavor to formulate a musical speech of his own.

For the writer, the greatest moment of this concert was the performance of "Vysehrad," the noble and heoric symphonic poem of Smetana, a man who wrote with a sincerity and a depth of emotion that are seldom felt today. Destroy the spirit of patriotism, and a tremendously vital quality of art has been lost. The age of steamheated flats has made another Smetana almost an impossibility. Of the race of heroes, one is left. He lives in Finland.

"Mother Goose" Music

The "Mother Goose" suite of Ravel was repeated again at these concerts. It is deeply admired by many musicians of this city, including Dr. Muck. It is a remarkable example of the finished art and the conscious naivete which has permeated almost all modern French music since Debussy immortalized his Melisande. This is intended for children's music. But for us, there are no children who enjoy this musical fairy tale. They are young fashionables. They are tutored, dressed carefully to walk with the governess in the park, and far be it from them to know the luxury of a dirty face. But the performance of music, so far apart as that of Smetana and Ravel was exemplary, and Dr. Muck did all that could be done with Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine," the final piece in the programme. It, unfortunately, is too long, and hence the only interest of the piece—the gradual acceleration of the dance and its rythmic changes is lost. Monotony ensues before the end has arrived.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 9.

SYMPHONY FOLK AT THEIR BEST

Pension Fund Concert Greatly Enjoyed—Well Chosen Wagner Program.

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon a concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra was given by its players, Dr. Muck conducting. The program, a Wagner one, was as follows:

Overture to "Tannhauser"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Introduction to Act III, "Die Meistersinger"—Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, "Gotterdammerung" (Arranged by Hans Richter)
"Siegfried Idyl"
Kaisermarsch

This list could hardly have been improved upon for a concert at which a large portion of the audience were not regular patrons of the Symphony concert, and in which there were likely to be many persons to whom extreme examples of Wagner's style might easily be wearisome. It showed the composer in varying moods and manners, but the dominant notes of the selections were beauty and delicacy of sentiment rather than an overplus of sound and fury, which might have been chosen and would not have appealed so well to a "popular" throng.

That the audience appreciated both the program and the way in which it was delivered was plainly shown by the remarkably close attention paid to the music, as if the listeners were afraid to lose a single phrase or note, and by the hearty, long-continued applause that followed each number.

Of the orchestra there is need of saying little. As usual at the pension fund concerts, the players threw themselves into their work with even more than their accustomed fire. Every bit of their individual skill was brought into play, so that with Dr. Muck giving the best of his inspiriting leadership and the men following him with responsive unity, the performance was as near perfection as is humanly possible.

With such a program and such a performance discrimination regarding separate numbers is idle, yet there was perhaps a shade more beauty and finish in the "Meistersinger" and "Siegfried" music than in the rest. As for the bombastic "Kaisermarsch," the audience seemed to care less for it than for the rest.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 9. 1914

WAGNER CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Heard in Masterly Interpretation of Ring and Other Music.

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an entire Wagnerian programme in aid of the Pension Fund of the orchestra. The programme:—

Overture to "Tannhauser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Introduction to Act III; Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, "Gotterdammerung." (Arranged by Hans Richter.
"Siegfried Idyl."
Kaisermarsch.

Dr. Muck stands today among the greatest of the living interpreters of Wagner, and, indeed, showed positive proof to this effect by yesterday's superb and admirable performance. It was only after much persuasion that he consented to favor the Boston audience by playing in a concert hall miscellaneous excerpts from music supposed to be written only for opera house performances. The numbers on the programme were arranged in such manner as to give a synopsis in excerpt form from the composer's chief works.

"Tannhauser"—the first number on the programme—might be called a transition work in which we discern the prophecy of those greater works which gradually but surely blossomed forth in later years. In this overture we find the melody rather sustained and continuous, more after the Italian style of that time. The chromatic and enharmonic progressions, however, find place in this work and point with increasing tendency toward the Wagner of the later drama. The orchestra played this overture in unsurpassable style, working up to its final and thrilling climax with extraordinary power and breadth of tone.

In "Lohengrin" is seen a greater consistent effort toward the attainment of a more continuous and flexible musical current. This prelude shows proof of being more highly original in conception and treatment. The tone of mediaeval chivalric and religious mysticism in this work was brought out in a beautiful and expressive manner. The exquisite and delicate tones of the violins from the opening measures unfolded themselves in a creation of the purest and most resistless beauty.

The numbers selected from "Die Meistersinger" were played with a beauty and grace seldom to be heard. This opera, although in the happiest vein, is never thought of in any slighter way than the more tragic works of the composer. The Dance of the Apprentices was played with graceful charm and delightful freshness of style. The Introduction to Act III. instantly brought to the mind of the listener the image of Hans Sachs, beloved by all for his never-failing store of good nature and kindheartedness.

The last half of the programme finally presented Wagner the mature artist. The music to the "Ring" transcends all other aspects of Wagnerism. The ethereal purity of tone color, replete with vague mysticism, constantly unfolded itself in undulating waves of resistless charm in these last selections. The golden tones of the trumpets were electrifying in their sudden outbursts, while their powerful crescendos worked up to thrilling climaxes with glorious volume of sound. The hall was filled with an appreciative audience, most of whom remained until the very end of the programme, applauding with warm and ardent enthusiasm.

K. C. B.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 9.

SUNDAY CONCERTS.

Dr Muck's Wagner Program for the Pension Fund.

Weingartners at the Opera House, With Ernest Schelling Pianist.

Two concerts, with two conductors of distinction, occupied the attention of the musical community yesterday. In the afternoon, at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund, Dr Muck played a program entirely from Wagner, and although unwilling, for he is a man with a discriminating sense of the boundaries that define opera house and concert hall, he gave pleasure to a large audience. In the evening, at the neighboring institution on Huntington av, Mr Weingartner presided over a concert benefited by his conducting and graced by the singing of his accomplished wife, and by the playing of Ernest Schelling, a pianist of admirable parts heard in Boston all too rarely.

The program by the Symphony men, although from Wagner, went beyond the more usual excerpts from the music dramas. Dr Muck began with the familiar overture to "Tannhauser" and prelude to "Lohengrin"—the latter was played with a spiritual exaltation hardly equaled even at these concerts—but made excursions to pages less familiar in the concert room.

With the music of "The Mastersingers" brought to attention by the recent performances at the Opera House, there was particular interest in the noble portrait Wagner drew of his philosopher, Sachs, of open mind and generous soul in the prelude to the third act, and in the music from the following scene—that of the gay dance of the apprentices, and the arrival of the [illegible] The playing was another tribute [illegible]

The music marking Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock from "Siegfried," and the Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung" includes some of the most beautiful pages from the former opera. The Siegfried Idyl and the Kaisermarsch concluded the program, the latter not among the most inspired of the Wagner music, but it must be remembered that last year Dr Muck offered a remarkable program representative of the epochs from "Rizzi" to "Parsifal."

The concert next Sunday afternoon will be given by Mme Alma Gluck and Harold Bauer.

From LEADER

Address: Pittsburg, Pa.

FEB 21 1914

, 1884

The Ellis Series

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts, to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close by the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Numerous letters are received daily in expression of the pleasure and benefit anticipated in the coming concerts, and assurance given of hearty co-operation in supporting the sterling list of attractions announced for next season, which includes such celebrated stars as Mme. Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera house; Pasqualo Amato, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan; Julia Culp, the world's foremost lieder singer; Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist; Fritz Kreisler, today the most popular violinist before the public, and Dr. Karl Muck, with the Boston Symphony, the world's foremost orchestra.

Subscribers of the present season are entitled to the same seats by giving notice on or before April 1 to Miss May Beegle, representing the Ellis concerts, 1312 Farmers Bank building. Those desiring to make a change in their location will be given first consideration after April 1 in advance of new subscribers, whose orders are also now being received and filed in order of receipt.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 9 1914

NEWS OF MUSIC

A FEW WORDS ON MR. URACK'S "REMINISCENCES"

The Symphony as Repeated on Saturday and the Thoughts It Arouses—Miss Sharlow Acquits Herself Admifably as Mimi on Short Notice—A New Opera and a Re-engaged Conductor for the Metropolitan

MR. URACK'S symphony was repeated at the Symphony Concert Saturday night, and received marked applause. No doubt the audience, moved by Saturday's newspaper reviews, had its ears atingle listening for "reminiscences." What an amount of vague talk centres about that word! To the lay mind there are only three things which a composer can do: he can either "create," or "plagiarize," or "reminisce." To many, "reminiscence" is only a polite term for "plagarizing," which, in turn, is a polite term for "stealing." At any rate, "reminiscence" is, to most of us, unconscious, deodorized theft. The fact is, that there is no such thing as absolute creation, and no such thing as absolute plagiarism. There is, in rare cases, such a thing as approximate creation and approximate plagiarism, and there are all grades and shades between.

In the first place, melodies are mostly made on the diatonic scale, even in these days, and it is surprising that its seven notes can furnish so vast a variety of distinct tunes as it does. Inevitably, some of these tunes will bear resemblances, and many a lusty composer has been surprised at being informed that he has "stolen bodily" from a writer he never heard of. But this is by the way. The important fact, which the layman knows but never thoroughly realizes, is that every composer, without a single exception in the history of music, has modeled his style on one or more composers or works, euphoniously called "influences." He has done this consciously, out of admiration and necessity, and with no intention of shining in reflected glory. Still more, he will do the same thing unconsciously, and any young composer (for example, Beethoven, at Mr. Urack's age) constructs his work almost entirely of elements already known and admired. Yet there is something creative in this imitative process, something to make the composition a thing in its own right. What that something is analysis can never determine. Bethoven's first sonatas are compositions in their own right, though there is scarcely a single element that cannot be found in Haydn.

Now given any composition that shows an "influence," it is generally impossible to determine whether the imitation was deliberate or sub-conscious. The question of "creativeness" can only be tested out in the laboratory of the composer's mind, and for that neither the critic, nor the general public, nor the composer himself, possesses the data. A composer, sitting down to write a melody, will inevitably construct it out of elements already a part of his musical make-up. The cause is not purely psychological; much less is it a matter of poverty of idea. Any careful study of the development of music will

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 7, 1914

SYMPHONY BY URACK LAUNCHED

First Serious Work of 'Cellist Given Reading

BY OLIN DOWNES

The novelty on the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall was a "Symphony No. 1" by Otto Urack, 'cellist and assistant conductor of the orchestra. Out of the depths of a full heart—and a full orchestra—Mr. Urack composed his symphony. His ears were filled with the glorious tone of one of the finest orchestrations in the world. He composed his symphony, and enjoyed the advantage which a young man of 30 may well prize, of conducting his composition and utilizing to the full the utmost resources of the greatest of instruments.

GENEROUS APPLAUSE

It is the merest fairness to Mr. Urack to record the fact that his symphony was exceedingly successful. Not the fourth symphony of Sibelius, one of the most prophetic works in the modern literature of the orchestra; not the "Iberia" of Debussy, wonderfully beautiful as it is; not the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss, which have been so successful with Symphony audiences. There was long continued applause after every movement of Mr. Urack's work, and at the end of the symphony the audience was loth to let the composer go. No wonder that he was gratified at such a reception, and it was a pleasant thing to see a musician receive such encouragement so soon in his career.

But surely Mr. Urack is aware, as were the more experienced listeners present, of the shortcomings of his symphony. Its virtues may be easily and clearly set forth. He has written with unmistakable enthusiasm, with a very considerable knowledge of the orchestra. He has written clearly and without dawdling over his ideas. His contagious enthusiasm was to be felt, even in the most banal and unoriginal moments.

Lack of Originality

This leads us to a principal and important defect: the almost total lack of originality in the thematic material. Wagner, Strauss, Puccini, modern Frenchmen, are jumbled together in this score. Not only themes, but instrumental effects are lifted almost bodily from the compositions with which Mr. Urack is familiar. The sonorities of Strauss, the brass of Bruckner, a certain after-climax in the Tannhauser overture—these effects, not to be a purist, or a pedant, or a spitefully critical person, were inescapable allusions to the works of other men.

Moreover, the orchestration, brilliant as it is, has the fault common to most composers in their earlier stages of development: it is too noisy; and, with all its effects, there is not sufficient simplicity and genuine variety and contrast of sonorities. The full orchestra works for dear life, and it makes a splendid sound, with the celesta, the two harps, the brass, the organ, and many other instruments which the composer employs.

Slow Movement Effective

The slow movement of this symphony is based upon a Bruckner-like theme treated as a song, and, considering the simplicity of the treatment and the constant reiterations of the theme, it may be said that it is treated with promising resource. That is, without employing variations of the original idea sufficiently complex to lead the hearer far afield, the theme itself does not become monotonous. The curve of the melody is wholly without originality, but the melody itself is treated with a freshness and resource which are innate with the composer.

Of the scherzo as much cannot be said. It is either cheap or labored. There is a suggestion of a Brucknerish figure for the opening measures. The second strain is a pretty commonplace waltz tune, effectively orchestrated. The finale is remarkable chiefly for the form and brilliance of its conclusion.

Emphasizes His Zeal

The directness of Mr. Urack's writing; the naivete which does not permit of his easily deceiving his scorer, bear witness to his zeal as a musician, and would the thought that his superabundant and needless employment of many instruments was intended a bait to his public. As any composer, confronted for the first time with an orchestra such as the Boston Symphony might do, he has written in a manner to employ all instruments and much effective virtuosity on the part of the players. But he himself will surely recognize the inherent poverty of his piece, and compose less hastily his second work of symphonic dimensions. He should go slowly; he should not mistake instrumental color or noise for ideas; he should endeavor to formulate a musical speech of his own.

For the writer, the greatest moment of this concert was the performance of "Vysehrad," the noble and heoric symphonic poem of Smetana, a man who wrote with a sincerity and a depth of emotion that are seldom felt today. Destroy the spirit of patriotism, and a tremendously vital quality of art has been lost. The age of steamheated flats has made another Smetana almost an impossibility. Of the race of heroes, one is left. He lives in Finland.

"Mother Goose" Music

The "Mother Goose" suite of Ravel was repeated again at these concerts. It is deeply admired by many musicians of this city, including Dr. Muck. It is a remarkable example of the finished art and the conscious naivete which has permeated almost all modern French music since Debussy immortalized his Melisande. This is intended for children's music. But for us, there are no children who enjoy this musical fairy tale. They are young fashionables. They are tutored, dressed carefully to walk with the governess in the park, and far be it from them to know the luxury of a dirty face. But the performance of music, so far apart as that of Smetana and Ravel was exemplary, and Dr. Muck did all that could be done with Enesco's "Rhapsodie Roumaine," the final piece in the programme. It, unfortunately, is too long, and hence the only interest of the piece—the gradual acceleration of the dance and its rythmic changes is lost. Monotony ensues before the end has arrived.

BOSTON HERALD.

MARCH 9.

SYMPHONY FOLK AT THEIR BEST

Pension Fund Concert Greatly Enjoyed — Well Chosen Wagner Program.

In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon a concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra was given by its players, Dr. Muck conducting. The program, a Wagner one, was as follows:

Overture to "Tannhauser"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Introduction to Act III, "Die Meistersinger"—Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs.
Siegfried's Passage to Brunnhilde's Rock, "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, "Gotterdammerung" (Arranged by Hans Richter)
"Siegfried Idyl"
Kaisermarsch

This list could hardly have been improved upon for a concert at which a large portion of the audience were not regular patrons of the Symphony concert, and in which there were likely to be many persons to whom extreme examples of Wagner's style might easily be wearisome. It showed the composer in varying moods and manners, but the dominant notes of the selections were beauty and delicacy of sentiment rather than an overplus of sound and fury, which might have been chosen and would not have appealed so well to a "popular" throng.

That the audience appreciated both the program and the way in which it was delivered was plainly shown by the remarkably close attention paid to the music, as if the listeners were afraid to lose a single phrase or note, and by the hearty, long-continued applause that followed each number.

Of the orchestra there is need of saying little. As usual at the pension fund concerts, the players threw themselves into their work with even more than their accustomed fire. Every bit of their individual skill was brought into play, so that with Dr. Muck giving the best of his inspiriting leadership and the men following him with responsive unity, the performance was as near perfection as is humanly possible.

With such a program and such a performance discrimination regarding separate numbers is idle, yet there was perhaps a shade more beauty and finish in the "Meistersinger" and "Siegfried" music than in the rest. As for the bombastic "Kaisermarsch," the audience seemed to care less for it than for the rest.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 9. 1914

WAGNER CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Heard in Masterly Interpretation of Ring and Other Music.

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an entire Wagnerian programme in aid of the Pension Fund of the orchestra. The programme:—

Overture to "Tannhauser."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Introduction to Act III; Dance of the Apprentices; Entrance of the Mastersingers; Homage to Hans Sachs; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
Siegfried's Passage to Brunhilde's Rock, "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey, "Gotterdammerung." (Arranged by Hans Richter.
"Siegfried Idyl."
Kaisermarsch.

Dr. Muck stands today among the greatest of the living interpreters of Wagner, and, indeed, showed positive proof to this effect by yesterday's superb and admirable performance. It was only after much persuasion that he consented to favor the Boston audience by playing in a concert hall miscellaneous excerpts from music supposed to be written only for opera house performances. The numbers on the programme were arranged in such manner as to give a synopsis in excerpt form from the composer's chief works.

"Tannhauser"—the first number on the programme—might be called a transition work in which we discern the prophecy of those greater works which gradually but surely blossomed forth in later years. In this overture we find the melody rather sustained and continuous, more after the Italian style of that time. The chromatic and enharmonic progressions, however, find place in this work and point with increasing tendency toward the Wagner of the later drama. The orchestra played this overture in unsurpassable style, working up to its final and thrilling climax with extraordinary power and breadth of tone.

In "Lohengrin" is seen a greater consistent effort toward the attainment of a more continuous and flexible musical current. This prelude shows proof of being more highly original in conception and treatment. The tone of mediaeval chivalric and religious mysticism in this work was brought out in a beautiful and expressive manner. The exquisite and delicate tones of the violins from the opening measures unfolded themselves in a creation of the purest and most resistless beauty.

The numbers selected from "Die Meistersinger" were played with a beauty and grace seldom to be heard. This opera, although in the happiest vein, is never thought of in any slighter way than the more tragic works of the composer. The Dance of the Apprentices was played with graceful charm and delightful freshness of style. The Introduction to Act III. instantly brought to the mind of the listener the image of Hans Sachs, beloved by all for his never-failing store of good nature and kindheartedness.

The last half of the programme finally presented Wagner the mature artist. The music to the "Ring" transcends all other aspects of Wagnerism. The ethereal purity of tone color, replete with vague mysticism, constantly unfolded itself in undulating waves of resistless charm in these last selections. The golden tones of the trumpets were electrifying in their sudden outbursts, while their powerful crescendos worked up to thrilling climaxes with glorious volume of sound. The hall was filled with an appreciative audience, most of whom remained until the very end of the programme, applauding with warm and ardent enthusiasm. K. C. B.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 9.

SUNDAY CONCERTS.

Dr Muck's Wagner Program for the Pension Fund.

Weingartners at the Opera House, With Ernest Schelling Pianist.

Two concerts, with two conductors of distinction, occupied the attention of the musical community yesterday. In the afternoon, at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund, Dr Muck played a program entirely from Wagner, and although unwilling, for he is a man with a discriminating sense of the boundaries that define opera house and concert hall, he gave pleasure to a large audience. In the evening, at the neighboring institution on Huntington av, Mr Weingartner presided over a concert benefited by his conducting and graced by the singing of his accomplished wife, and by the playing of Ernest Schelling, a pianist of admirable parts heard in Boston all too rarely.

The program by the Symphony men, although from Wagner, went beyond the more usual excerpts from the music dramas. Dr Muck began with the familiar overture to "Tannhauser" and prelude to "Lohengrin"—the latter was played with a spiritual exaltation hardly equaled even at these concerts—but made excursions to pages less familiar in the concert room.

With the music of "The Mastersingers" brought to attention by the recent performances at the Opera House, there was particular interest in the noble portrait Wagner drew of his philosopher, Sachs, of open mind and generous soul in the prelude to the third act, and in the music from the following scene—that of the gay dance of the apprentices, and the arrival of the

The playing was another tribute

The music marking Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock from "Siegfried," and the Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung" includes some of the most beautiful pages from the former opera. The Siegfried Idyl and the Kaisermarsch concluded the program, the latter not among the most inspired of the Wagner music, but it must be remembered that last year Dr Muck offered a remarkable program representative of the epochs from "Rizzi" to "Parsifal."

The concert next Sunday afternoon will be given by Mme Alma Gluck and Harold Bauer.

From LEADER

Address: Pittsburg, Pa.

21 1914

The Ellis Series

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts, to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close by the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Numerous letters are received daily in expression of the pleasure and benefit anticipated in the coming concerts, and assurance given of hearty co-operation in supporting the sterling list of attractions announced for next season, which includes such celebrated stars as Mme. Olive Fremstad, the principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera house; Pasqualo Amato, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan; Julia Culp, the world's foremost lieder singer; Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist; Fritz Kreisler, today the most popular violinist before the public, and Dr. Karl Muck, with the Boston Symphony, the world's foremost orchestra.

Subscribers of the present season are entitled to the same seats by giving notice on or before April 1 to Miss May Beegle, representing the Ellis concerts, 1312 Farmers Bank building. Those desiring to make a change in their location will be given first consideration after April 1 in advance of new subscribers, whose orders are also now being received and filed in order of receipt.

TRANSCRIPT,

MARCH 9 1914

NEWS OF MUSIC

A FEW WORDS ON MR. URACK'S "REMINISCENCES"

The Symphony as Repeated on Saturday and the Thoughts It Arouses—Miss Sharlow Acquits Herself Admifably as Mimi on Short Notice—A New Opera and a Re-engaged Conductor for the Metropolitan

MR. URACK'S symphony was repeated at the Symphony Concert Saturday night, and received marked applause. No doubt the audience, moved by Saturday's newspaper reviews, had its ears atingle listening for "reminiscences." What an amount of vague talk centres about that word! To the lay mind there are only three things which a composer can do: he can either "create," or "plagiarize," or "reminisce." To many, "reminiscence" is only a polite term for "plagarizing," which, in turn, is a polite term for "stealing." At any rate, "reminiscence" is, to most of us, unconscious, deodorized theft. The fact is, that there is no such thing as absolute creation, and no such thing as absolute plagiarism. There is, in rare cases, such a thing as approximate creation and approximate plagiarism, and there are all grades and shades between.

In the first place, melodies are mostly made on the diatonic scale, even in these days, and it is surprising that its seven notes can furnish so vast a variety of distinct tunes as it does. Inevitably, some of these tunes wil bear resemblances, and many a lusty composer has been surprised at being informed that he has "stolen bodily" from a writer he never heard of. But this is by the way. The important fact, which the layman knows but never thoroughly realizes, is that every composer, without a single exception in the history of music, has modeled his style on one or more composers or works, euphoniously called "influences." He has done this consciously, out of admiration and necessity, and with no intention of shining in reflected glory. Still more, he will do the same thing unconsciously, and any young composer (for example, Beethoven, at Mr. Urack's age) constructs his work almost entirely of elements already known and admired. Yet there is something creative in this imitative process, something to make the composition a thing in its own right. What that something is analysis can never determine. Bethoven's first sonatas are compositions in their own right, though there is scarcely a single element that cannot be found in Haydn.

Now given any composition that shows an "influence," it is generally impossible to determine whether the imitation was deliberate or sub-conscious. The question of "creativeness" can only be tested out in the laboratory of the composer's mind, and for that neither the critic, nor the general public, nor the composer himself, possesses the data. A composer, sitting down to write a melody, will inevitably construct it out of elements already a part of his musical make-up. The cause is not purely psychological; much less is it a matter of poverty of idea. Any careful study of the development of music will show that [illegible] at hand (that is, any absolutely "creative" music) would be musical nonsense; it would be only a chance mingling of notes on paper, and therefore not creative at all. Thus every composer must and should use the familiar materials, if he wishes to carry any message to his audience and if he wishes to give his work any coherence.

The test is the manner in which the musical stock-in-trade operates in the composer's creative process. A tyro will lift tunes and harmonies bodily because his technique is not at his command; a thoroughly trained musician will have his musical stock-in-trade organized into his subconscious make-up, so that it operates sensitively, personally, with intensely complex and delicate selective processes, and becomes, in the composing of music, truly creative. It is out of the recombination of old materials that the new is made. Not what the materials are but how they are recombined determines the creative quality of the art.

Reviews of Mr. Urack's symphony sounded like a review of the nineteenth century. In easy recollection he is gently accused of having borrowed from Wagner, Strauss, Humperdinck, Brahms, Bruckner, Grieg, Puccini and Debussy. Let us add a random list of names from Grove's dictionary and be done with it. Truly, wide and commendable scholarship, if nothing else!

But the practical test, finally, is simply: did the symphony give pleasure? Beyond a doubt it did, to some more than to others. If the similarities noted were to some ears so close and insistent as to be painful, then that was the composer's failure, and therein the symphony was weak. If, on the other hand, they proved grateful, and sounded, in spite of previous familiarity, fresh, then the composer's work was to all practical purposes creative. The youthfulness and freshness, as well as the creative vigor of many passages that cannot easily be traced to a prototype, are beyond a question. The enjoyment of the symphony was great with some hearers, varying personally among individuals. It is futile and empty to take the high altitude in "judging" the work, trying to determine its "absolute" value. Most of us are glad we heard it. Whether it is, essentially, "creative" or "reminiscent," is for Mr. Urack to figure out, if he have the necessary leisure, in the privacy of his study.

MUCK AND WEINGARTNER

WAGNER FROM TWO ILLUSTRIOUS CONDUCTORS

The Contrasting Concerts of Sunday—Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra Outdo Themselves in a Pension-Fund Concert—Mr. Weingartner in More or Less Hampering Circumstance — The Ripened Schelling

NOT even in Berlin where concerts are as the sands of the sea and the writers and the players of music almost as many as the pebbles that strew them, do Dr. Muck and Mr. Weingartner, each of the first rank in his profession, often conduct in a single day. They did so yesterday here in Boston and the town was so indifferent to its unusual opportunity that only a plentiful distribution of tickets, in visible progress in the lobby of the Opera House, gathered a presentable audience for Mr. Weingartner while vacant chairs, though not many, were discoverable for Dr. Muck in Symphony Hall. Moreover, by one of those coincidences that somehow or other beset these juxtapositions of eminent conductors the world over, Dr. Muck made his whole programme out of Wagner's music, while the two outstanding orchestral items on Mr. Weingartner's list happened to be the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the prelude to "Tristan."

If there was any rivalry between the conductors and the organizers of the two concerts—and all the conventions of reviewing reject the mere thought of such a thing even though it stares the reviewer in the face—the advantage was all on Dr. Muck's side. There is no comparison between the Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra of the Opera House in the music of Wagner. Dr. Muck is in the full flower of ambition and achievement, while Mr. Weingartner has come to the Opera House to take "Die Meistersinger" at second hand, as it were, after Mr. Caplet, to have but one performance of "Don Giovanni" in his own right, to enjoy no opportunity at all with "Tristan," except in the prelude of last evening and in general to have nothing to himself but an "Otello," not always too well cast. To the mere observer on the side, even the lot of an eminent conductor, called hither and thither to the opera houses and the concert rooms of the Western World, does not always seem to be happy. No wonder that the atmosphere of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was considerably more exhilarating than that of the Opera House in the evening. Its ventures into concerts have not always been fortunate, but until last evening they have been at least intelligent. Yesterday it placed the orchestra in its usual pit, while perched remotely upon the stage the pianist, Mr. Schelling, played Chopin's concerto in F minor upon a piano that bore on the side in letters big enough to be read in every corner of the house the name of its makers. Orchestras giving concerts usually sit on the stage; pianists playing concertos are usually close to the bands that accompany them; and labelling pianos in this pompous fashion "went out" in concerts hereabouts twenty-five years ago. No; concerts are not exactly the trade of the Opera House. Perhaps it is politest to say that it is awkward with them. It ought not to be when the conductor comes from the august concert-rooms of Vienna and Berlin.

* * *

The more perhaps was Dr. Muck, who has a streak of perverse irony, on his mettle because he had yielded a conviction or two in the ordering of the concert. If he had his own way, he would play no pieces from Wagner's operas and music-dramas, except overtures, preludes and instrumental fragments complete in themselves and nearly independent of the theatre. Yet on such a basis there is no making [illegible] year for the [illegible] Fund [illegible] seems nec[illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] act [illegible] Meistersinger [illegible] Apprentices' Dance [illegible] procession for the Masters and [illegible] people's chorus acclaiming Sachs." On[illegible] leap from the introduction to the [illegible] was made, the music at least is fairly continuous. It is not so in the other "arrangement" from the music-dramas in which Dr. Muck went even a step further. In the days when it was hard to get any hearing at all in theatre or concert hall for Wagner's music, the devoted Richter extracted sundry pages from the music in the third act of "Siegfried" that bears the hero through flame and mist up to Brünnhilde's rock, pinned to it other pages from the scene between the pair that is the second prologue to "Götterdämmerung" and then "to conclude" added yet other pages of the intermezzo in that music-drama that pictures Siegfried's journey along the Rhine to Gunther's house.

Now, if there was ever "music of the scene," it is the music that accompanies Siegfried's ascent. It is only half itself without the picture that the stage is making. The voices are quite as essential as the orchestra to the "homage to Sachs," if it is to make anything like the impression for which Wagner designed it. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" is one thing when an audience has been "working up" to it through two acts and two hours and another when it springs out of the air as a concert piece. Like the fragments of "Götterdämmerung," this music is good to hear anywhere as symphonic music with a programme, more or less guessed by the audience, behind it; but it remains none the less music that is itself only in the theatre.

So, by actual test was Dr. Muck justified in his convictions and also—by the everlasting paradox of things—in his yielding to them. For even with "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan" in the repertory of the Opera House, we hear less of Wagner's music than does any other musical capital and only in concerts may we hear it as the Symphony Orchestra plays it. The band outdid itself yesterday and in more senses than one the conductor was the leader in the deed. The horns gave him back the golden richness and depth of tone that he asked in the intoning of the Pilgrims' Chorus at the beginning of the overture to "Tannhäuser"; but it was he that chose a pace—slower than most conductors use—that gave their song its grave magnificence. The orchestra phrased the song to Venus as though a voice and not choirs of instruments were singing, and it was the conductor who had taught the phrasing. Equally to him and to them the music of the Venusberg owed the sensual tang that the conductor's rhythm sharpened and he had foreseen the end from the beginning when the returning Pilgrims Chorus flooded first the orchestra, then the hall, and then every ear and heart that heard.

With such divination of the pace that not only animates the music but seems the revelation of the composer's imagining with it, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the Apprentices' Dance. Life and youth were in it; out of it flashed the pageant of which it is a part; the rhythm sustained the waltz or else varied it as by impulsive prompting. As nearly as an orchestra by itself could do, conductor and men wove Brunnhilde's curtain of misty flame; out of it sang Siegfried's horn; and at the end it seemed to part for the moment of ecstatic suspense when Siegfried touches the summit. So an orchestra plays when the conductor touches it with the fire of his own imagination and warms it into the drama that he feels. So kindled, it is capable of the golden sonorities it gave to the Rhine Maidens' song or the mellow pomp with which it marshalled the Masters into the meadow. Stage or no stage, there were atmosphere and picture. The sheer tonal richness of it all filled and transported.

As conductor and orchestra did these feats of mellow power or of thrilling rhythm, so, in the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Siegfried Idyl," they did others of almost breathless finesse. Ray upon ray, the entering instruments seemed to add new depth to the shimmering radiance of the path of the descending grail; ray after ray, they seemed to melt out of the shimmer as it went heavenward again. It was as though one voice—the conductor's—had phrased and sung the whole, and singing, raised the vision that Wagner saw. The "Siegfried Idyl" passes too often as a perfunctory and somewhat prolix concert-piece, to be played for lack of almost anything else out of Wagner that is not operatic. Heard as it was yesterday, it becomes the expression of intimate, whispering, tremulous happiness in tones—the very stirrings of a poet's heart toward the woman he loves, music upon which any listening ears—outside Cosima's and his—seem almost an intrusion. Out of Dr. Muck's feeling for it, out of the orchestra's super-sensibility with it, the idyl sang out of Wagner's heart. Beside this song and in not altogether imaginary complement to it, stood the ampler eloquence of the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The analysts—to say nothing of our own ears—have told us out of what motives it springs and how it epitomizes the whole course and mood of the music drama. Yet somehow, heard in such tonal beauty as clothed it yesterday and so filled with an emotion that was of tones themselves more than of a moment in an opera, it seemed rather to hold within itself for an instant all that flood of manifold and intense pleasure that Wagner's music, so played, pours over our fortunate generation.

* * *

Diversity rather than distinction characterized the concert at the Opera House, and through no shortcoming on Mr. Weingartner's part. He must take the orchestra there as it is; he must make the most of such opportunities for rehearsal as he has; he must even show that a conductor of his quality can beat down seemingly adverse circumstance under the feet of his own ability. The orchestra did its best for him and a little more; but it could not give him back the depths of tone, the incisiveness of phrase, the rhythmic verve or the flowing euphonies that his version of the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the prelude to "Tristan" asked. Like Dr. Muck, Mr. Weingartner knows the pace for the grave and gathering eloquence of the Pil-[illegible]s. He imagines the overture [illegible] over the [illegible] But he co[illegible] strike fire out of the orchestra [illegible] or make it sing with the [illegible] of his imagination. It utters the phrases of the prelude to "Tristan," it follows Mr. Weingartner's adroit cumulation of them; but the 'cellos are not the voice of fate, or the whole band the voices of passion insatiable, mounting, dying and ready to mount again. There was very earnest coöperation; there was less oneness of transfused and released voice.

* * *

Sometimes while Mr. Schelling played Chopin's concerto, that coöperation was not the surest or the most delicate imaginable; but happily the music is intrinsically a solo piece with orchestral accompaniment. Out of it and out of the general conditions of the occasion shone, none the less, Mr. Schelling's ripened powers—his technical ease and fluency with its clear play of ordered and sensitive control, his feeling for songful and multi-colored tone; his artful simplicity; his soft brilliance, exactly at one with Chopin's music; his response to it as lyric and changeful song. At every turn his accomplishment matched his discernment. When Mme. Weingartner sang sundry songs and Isolde's final speech this happy balance trembled. Her voice is rich and she often uses it well; but her imagination and intuition are poor beside it.

H. T. P.

TRAVELER
Y, MARCH 9

Pension Fund Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in its annual Wagner program, the occasion being the second and last of the two yearly concerts in aid of the pension fund. The program consisted of the overture to "Tannhaeustr," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the introduction to act III, dance of the apprentices, entrance of the mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger," Hans Richter's arrangement of the passage to Brunhilde's rock from "Siegfried" and Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine journey from "Goetterdammerung," the familiar "Siegfried Idyl" and the Kaisermarsch. It was a pleasure to hear Dr. Muck in Wagner, though the advisability of a whole program devoted to his works may be questioned, and surely the "Tannhaeuser" overture and the "Lohengrin" prelude have been heard often enough as concert pieces. The ring music seemed like an old friend—it has been some time since any of it has been heard here. Probably the Kaisermarsch would not be missed if the score were lost.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
MARCH 9, 1914

WAGNER MUSIC PLAYED

Giving its second pension fund concert, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, played a program of Wagnerian selections in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon to the pleasure of a fair-sized audience. The works comprised the "Tannhaeuser" overture, the "Lohengrin" prelude, music from the third act of "Meistersinger," Ritchter's arrangement of music from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" as an orchestral suite, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Kairsermarsch."

The chief question raised by the performance was as to the value of adaptations out of the dramatic portions of Wagner's operas. There could be little question about the orchestra's playing or Dr. Muck's directing, except whether certain passages surpassed the achievement of ormer performances or fell slightly below. In the case of the "Siegfried Idyl," which is doubtless to the majority of enthusiasts the most engrossing adventure in unvoiced music that Wagner ever made, there could well be comparison with the interpretation of the week before at the Symphony concerts. For the "Idyl" of Sunday was distinctly the less brilliant. As to arrangements from the music dramas, while they always have an effect of irrelevancy and incompleteness, they are of the greatest informational and illustrative worth. The interest of the audience in the "Meistersinger" and "Ring" excerpts on Sunday proved that such music can hold attention in spite of its lack of structural import. It is accepted at its value as a partial message and is keenly appreciated.

Being just a dip into random volumes of the Wagnerian shelf, it gives its enlightenment on the composer's purposes and connects the listener with the artistic and social stir of the nineteenth century, just as an hour's desultory browsing in a Shakespearian set throws the reader right into the life of the Elizabethans. Regarded from such a standpoint, the excerpts are of great profit. The catalogue of them for use in the annual Wagnerian fund concerts could well be extended to include at least one more than now available. The music from the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," for example, arranged by a judicious hand, ought to make an acceptable selection. The fact that a large part of the public knows certain of the dramas in their complete form and is likely in the coming seasons to know still others, makes the idea not less but more desirable. A purely orchestral reading of Wagner's scores though perhaps not advisable in regular symphony concerts, is in place in popular concerts.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 14, 1914

LONG PROGRAMME

Symphony by Chadwick and Goldmark's Tone Poem Performed Before Paderewski's Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of insufferable length—the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—brought its reward yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. Paderewski stepped upon the platform and gave a memorable performance of his own piano concerto. The programme had this peculiarity: that it contained music either new or unknown to the majority of the present generation, and that this music was by living composers, and that all these composers were present in person to witness the reception of their compositions.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in F-major, George W. Chadwick; tone-poem, "Samson," (Mss.) Rubin Goldmark; piano concerto in A-minor, Ignace Paderewski. Soloist, Mr. Paderewski.

The short and happy career of Otto Urack's symphony No. 1 was enjoyed last week. That unfortunate symphony was wildly applauded. Mr. Chadwick's F-major symphony is better music. With an admirable sense of proportion, ratio, the audience applauded it a little less than half as heartily as it applauded Mr. Urack's ingenuous effort. The symphony by Chadwick is fully three-fifths better than the symphony by Urack. It is the work of an accomplished musician, a workman who knows his tools and what he intends to accomplish with them, and a workman with an honest and estimable regard for laws of form and principles of classic beauty. The symphony, it is true, is verbose; the material does not warrant its extension. Nevertheless, the workmanship holds it together, and the first movement, and Scherzo, especially, are composed lustily, the orchestra, throughout, making a brave sound.

Why do we not hear Mr. Chadwick's Melpomene overture, a composition, as one recalls it in retrospect, which is equally strong in its musical content and dramatic in its character, or the second symphony in B flat, by authoritative report, a far more individual and distinctive work than the symphony heard yesterday?

Goldmark's "Samson"

Mr. Goldmark, whose overture, "Hiawatha," made an excellent impression when heard here in 1900 and in 1906—a youthful work, it is true, but full of feeling and atmosphere—tells us in the programme book that his intention in writing "Samson" was an attempt to portray the broad moods of the Delilah episode, and its attendant circumstances. If so, why "detached chords in the woodwind and brass" to show Samson's "tugging at the temple walls," and other effects of themes and counterthemes, laboriously contrived, and only to be appreciated by the average hearer after a minute acquaintance with each theme and its meaning?

Mr. Goldmark, a musician, of the most serious aims and sincerity of purpose, looks back upon his "Hiawatha" as an early and immature work. It may be that, but we are bound to confess that at a first hearing the music heard yesterday is for us more labored, less significant and less eloquent in the portrayal of moods.

Paderewski's Own Piece

Then Mr. Paderewski, composer-pianist, stepped upon the stage. His concerto is a vehicle for a pianist, but it is a well made vehicle, and after the modern manner. Not all pianists write in this way when they write for themselves. This is from the note of William Foster Apthorp, quoted in the programme book: "Although the work was written by a pianist, by far the greater part of its musical structure and development is confided to the orchestra and comparatively little to the pianoforte. By this it is not meant that the pianoforte is not almost constantly doing something, but . . . he invariably gives it that to do which it can do best, and generally, that which it alone can do."

Mr. Paderewski played like a creator. He is apparently in the pink of technical condition. He played as probably no pianist since Rubinstein has played, with extraordinary rythm and elan, with indescribable tones, with a prodigious command of the utmost resources of his instrument. His piano was a second orchestra, having its own instrumental colors and its own instrumental style. It supplemented the second orchestra, and such was the prowess of the performer and the manner in which he had scored his work, that it seemed as though the piano was bearing up the orchestra, rather than the great body of instruments supporting and augmenting the tone of the piano.

A Marvellous Performance

Here, indeed, Mr. Paderewski came, saw and conquered! If his work had been less immediately effective than it is, it would have been made electrifying by his performance. Thanks to Dr. Muck, most of the solo performances at the Symphony concerts assume a remarkable balanced, homogenous and symphonic character. Yesterday, again, Dr. Muck provided an accompaniment for the gods, but now it was the man at the piano who commanded, while others obeyed. And what a marvellous thing, under such circumstances, is the play of nerves and muscles and tendons of steel! When the fingers are as sure and firm and velvety as the paw of a lion, simply a sort of inspired mecha[illegible] for which nothing is im[illegible] elements at hand (that is, any absolutely "creative" music) would be musical nonsense; it would be only a chance mingling of notes on paper, and therefore not creative at all. Thus every composer must and should use the familiar materials, if he wishes to carry any message to his audience and if he wishes to give his work any coherence.

The test is the manner in which the musical stock-in-trade operates in the composer's creative process. A tyro will lift tunes and harmonies bodily because his technique is not at his command; a thoroughly trained musician will have his musical stock-in-trade organized into his subconscious make-up, so that it operates sensitively, personally, with intensely complex and delicate selective processes, and becomes, in the composing of music, truly creative. It is out of the recombination of old materials that the new is made. Not what the materials are but how they are recombined determines the creative quality of the art.

Reviews of Mr. Urack's symphony sounded like a review of the nineteenth century. In easy recollection he is gently accused of having borrowed from Wagner, Strauss, Humperdinck, Brahms, Bruckner, Grieg, Puccini and Debussy. Let us add a random list of names from Grove's dictionary and be done with it. Truly, wide and commendable scholarship, if nothing else!

But the practical test, finally, is simply: did the symphony give pleasure? Beyond a doubt it did, to some more than to others. If the similarities noted were to some ears so close and insistent as to be painful, then that was the composer's failure, and therein the symphony was weak. If, on the other hand, they proved grateful, and sounded, in spite of previous familiarity, fresh, then the composer's work was to all practical purposes creative. The youthfulness and freshness, as well as the creative vigor of many passages that cannot easily be traced to a prototype, are beyond a question. The enjoyment of the symphony was great with some hearers, varying personally among individuals. It is futile and empty to take the high altitude in "judging" the work, trying to determine its "absolute" value. Most of us are glad we heard it. Whether it is, essentially, "creative" or "reminiscent," is for Mr. Urack to figure out, if he have the necessary leisure, in the privacy of his study.

MASS., MONDAY

MUCK AND WEINGARTNER

WAGNER FROM TWO ILLUSTRIOUS CONDUCTORS

The Contrasting Concerts of Sunday—Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra Outdo Themselves in a Pension-Fund Concert—Mr. Weingartner in More or Less Hampering Circumstance — The Ripened Schelling

NOT even in Berlin where concerts are as the sands of the sea and the writers and the players of music almost as many as the pebbles that strew them, do Dr. Muck and Mr. Weingartner, each of the first rank in his profession, often conduct in a single day. They did so yesterday here in Boston and the town was so indifferent to its unusual opportunity that only a plentiful distribution of tickets, in visible progress in the lobby of the Opera House, gathered a presentable audience for Mr. Weingartner while vacant chairs, though not many, were discoverable for Dr. Muck in Symphony Hall. Moreover, by one of those coincidences that somehow or other beset these juxtapositions of eminent conductors the world over, Dr. Muck made his whole programme out of Wagner's music, while the two outstanding orchestral items on Mr. Weingartner's list happened to be the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the prelude to "Tristan."

If there was any rivalry between the conductors and the organizers of the two concerts—and all the conventions of reviewing reject the mere thought of such a thing even though it stares the reviewer in the face—the advantage was all on Dr. Muck's side. There is no comparison between the Symphony Orchestra and the orchestra of the Opera House in the music of Wagner. Dr. Muck is in the full flower of ambition and achievement, while Mr. Weingartner has come to the Opera House to take "Die Meistersinger" at second hand, as it were, after Mr. Caplet, to have but one performance of "Don Giovanni" in his own right, to enjoy no opportunity at all with "Tristan," except in the prelude of last evening and in general to have nothing to himself but an "Otello," not always too well cast. To the mere observer on the side, even the lot of an eminent conductor, called hither and thither to the opera houses and the concert rooms of the Western World, does not always seem to be happy. No wonder that the atmosphere of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was considerably more exhilarating than that of the Opera House in the evening. Its ventures into concerts have not always been fortunate, but until last evening they have been at least intelligent. Yesterday it placed the orchestra in its usual pit, while perched remotely upon the stage the pianist, Mr. Schelling, played Chopin's concerto in F minor upon a piano that bore on the side in letters big enough to be read in every corner of the house the name of its makers. Orchestras giving concerts usually sit on the stage; pianists playing concertos are usually close to the bands that accompany them; and labelling pianos in this pompous fashion "went out" in concerts hereabouts twenty-five years ago. No; concerts are not exactly the trade of the Opera House. Perhaps it is politest to say that it is awkward with them. It ought not to be when the conductor comes from the august concert-rooms of Vienna and Berlin.

The more perhaps was Dr. Muck, who has a streak of perverse irony, on his mettle because he had yielded a conviction or two in the ordering of the concert. If he had his own way, he would play no pieces from Wagner's operas and music-dramas, except overtures, preludes and instrumental fragments complete in themselves and nearly independent of the theatre. Yet on such a basis there is no making a [illegible] Programme" a year for the Fund [illegible] h seems nec[illegible] [illegible] ase of it. [illegible] cordingly Dr. [illegible] yesterday led the orchestra [illegible] gh the Introduction to the third act of [illegible] Meistersinger," the Apprentices' Dance, the processional music for the Masters and the people's chorus acclaiming Sachs. Once the leap from the introduction to the dance was made, the music at least is fairly continuous. It is not so in the other "arrangement" from the music-dramas in which Dr. Muck went even a step further. In the days when it was hard to get any hearing at all in theatre or concert hall for Wagner's music, the devoted Richter extracted sundry pages from the music in the third act of "Siegfried" that bears the hero through flame and mist up to Brünnhilde's rock, pinned to it other pages from the scene between the pair that is the second prologue to "Götterdämmerung" and then "to conclude" added yet other pages of the intermezzo in that music-drama that pictures Siegfried's journey along the Rhine to Gunther's house.

Now, if there was ever "music of the scene," it is the music that accompanits Siegfried's ascent. It is only half itself without the picture that the stage is making. The voices are quite as essential as the orchestra to the "homage to Sachs," if it is to make anything like the impression for which Wagner designed it. The introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" is one thing when an audience has been "working up" to it through two acts and two hours and another when it springs out of the air as a concert piece. Like the fragments of "Götterdämmerung," this music is good to hear anywhere as symphonic music with a programme, more or less guessed by the audience, behind it; but it remains none the less music that is itself only in the theatre.

So, by actual test was Dr. Muck justified in his convictions and also—by the everlasting paradox of things—in his yielding to them. For even with "Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan" in the repertory of the Opera House, we hear less of Wagner's music than does any other musical capital and only in concerts may we hear it as the Symphony Orchestra plays it. The band outdid itself yesterday and in more senses than one the conductor was the leader in the deed. The horns gave him back the golden richness and depth of tone that he asked in the intoning of the Pilgrims' Chorus at the beginning of the overture to "Tannhäuser"; but it was he that chose a pace—slower than most conductors use—that gave their song its grave magnificence. The orchestra phrased the song to Venus as though a voice and not choirs of instruments were singing, and it was the conductor who had taught the phrasing. Equally to him and to them the music of the Venusberg owed the sensual tang that the conductor's rhythm sharpened and he had foreseen the end from the beginning when the returning Pilgrims Chorus flooded first the orchestra, then the hall, and then every ear and heart that heard.

With such divination of the pace that not only animates the music but seems the revelation of the composer's imagining with it, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the Apprentices' Dance. Life and youth were in it; out of it flashed the pageant of which it is a part; the rhythm sustained the waltz or else varied it as by impulsive prompting. As nearly as an orchestra by itself could do, conductor and men wove Brunnhilde's curtain of misty flame; out of it sang Siegfried's horn; and at the end it seemed to part for the moment of ecstatic suspense when Siegfried touches the summit. So an orchestra plays when the conductor touches it with the fire of his own imagination and warms it into the drama that he feels. So kindled, it is capable of the golden sonorities it gave to the Rhine Maidens' song or the mellow pomp with which it marshalled the Masters into the meadow. Stage or no stage, there were atmosphere and picture. The sheer tonal richness of it all filled and transported.

As conductor and orchestra did these feats of mellow power or of thrilling rhythm, so, in the prelude to "Lohengrin" and the "Siegfried Idyl," they did others of almost breathless finesse. Ray upon ray, the entering instruments seemed to add new depth to the shimmering radiance of the path of the descending grail; ray after ray, they seemed to melt out of the shimmer as it went heavenward again. It was as though one voice—the conductor's—had phrased and sung the whole, and singing, raised the vision that Wagner saw. The "Siegfried Idyl" passes too often as a perfunctory and somewhat prolix concert-piece, to be played for lack of almost anything else out of Wagner that is not operatic. Heard as it was yesterday, it becomes the expression of intimate, whispering, tremulous happiness in tones—the very stirrings of a poet's heart toward the woman he loves, music upon which any listening ears—outside Cosima's and his—seem almost an intrusion. Out of Dr. Muck's feeling for it, out of the orchestra's super-sensibility with it, the idyl sang out of Wagner's heart. Beside this song and in not altogether imaginary complement to it, stood the ampler eloquence of the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The analysts—to say nothing of our own ears—have told us out of what motives it springs and how it epitomizes the whole course and mood of the music drama. Yet somehow, heard in such tonal beauty as clothed it yesterday and so filled with an emotion that was of tones themselves more than of a moment in an opera, it seemed rather to hold within itself for an instant all that flood of manifold and intense pleasure that Wagner's music, so played, pours over our fortunate generation.

Diversity rather than distinction characterized the concert at the Opera House, and through no shortcoming on Mr. Weingartner's part. He must take the orchestra there as it is; he must make the most of such opportunities for rehearsal as he has; he must even show that a conductor of his quality can beat down seemingly adverse circumstance under the feet of his own ability. The orchestra did its best for him and a little more; but it could not give him back the depths of tone, the incisiveness of phrase, the rhythmic verve or the flowing euphonies that his version of the overture to "Tannhäuser" and the prelude to "Tristan" asked. Like Dr. Muck, Mr. Weingartner knows the pace for the grave and gathering eloquence of the Pilgrims' [illegible]. He imagines the overture [illegible] of its [illegible] tory of the [illegible] over the spirit begins. But he could hardly strike fire out of the orchestra last evening or make it sing with the voice of his imagination. It utters the phrases of the prelude to "Tristan," it follows Mr. Weingartner's adroit cumulation of them; but the 'cellos are not the voice of fate, or the whole band the voices of passion insatiable, mounting, dying and ready to mount again. There was very earnest coöperation; there was less oneness of transfused and released voice.

Sometimes while Mr. Schelling played Chopin's concerto, that coöperation was not the surest or the most delicate imaginable; but happily the music is intrinsically a solo piece with orchestral accompaniment. Out of it and out of the general conditions of the occasion shone, none the less, Mr. Schelling's ripened powers—his technical ease and fluency with its clear play of ordered and sensitive control, his feeling for songful and multi-colored tone; his artful simplicity; his soft brilliance, exactly at one with Chopin's music; his response to it as lyric and changeful song. At every turn his accomplishment matched his discernment. When Mme. Weingartner sang sundry songs and Isolde's final speech this happy balance trembled. Her voice is rich and she often uses it well; but her imagination and intuition are poor beside it.

H. T. P.

TRAVELER

Y, MARCH 9

Pension Fund Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in its annual Wagner program, the occasion being the second and last of the two yearly concerts in aid of the pension fund. The program consisted of the overture to "Tannhaeustr," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the introduction to act III, dance of the apprentices, entrance of the mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs from "Die Meistersinger," Hans Richter's arrangement of the passage to Brunhilde's rock from "Siegfried" and Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine journey from "Goetterdammerung," the familiar "Siegfried Idyl" and the Kaisermarsch. It was a pleasure to hear Dr. Muck in Wagner, though the advisability of a whole program devoted to his works may be questioned, and surely the "Tannhaeuser" overture and the "Lohengrin" prelude have been heard often enough as concert pieces. The ring music seemed like an old friend—it has been some time since any of it has been heard here. Probably the Kaisermarsch would not be missed if the score were lost.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

, MARCH 9, 1914

WAGNER MUSIC PLAYED

Giving its second pension fund concert, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck conductor, played a program of Wagnerian selections in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon to the pleasure of a fair-sized audience. The works comprised the "Tannhaeuser" overture, the "Lohengrin" prelude, music from the third act of "Meistersinger," Ritchter's arrangement of music from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" as an orchestral suite, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Kairsermarsch."

The chief question raised by the performance was as to the value of adaptations out of the dramatic portions of Wagner's operas. There could be little question about the orchestra's playing or Dr. Muck's directing, except whether certain passages surpassed the achievement of ormer performances or fell slightly below. In the case of the "Siegfried Idyl," which is doubtless to the majority of enthusiasts the most engrossing adventure in unvoiced music that Wagner ever made, there could well be comparison with the interpretation of the week before at the Symphony concerts. For the "Idyl" of Sunday was distinctly the less brilliant. As to arrangements from the music dramas, while they always have an effect of irrelevancy and incompleteness, they are of the greatest informational and illustrative worth. The interest of the audience in the "Meistersinger" and "Ring" excerpts on Sunday proved that such music can hold attention in spite of its lack of structural import. It is accepted at its value as a partial message and is keenly appreciated.

Being just a dip into random volumes of the Wagnerian shelf, it gives its enlightenment on the composer's purposes and connects the listener with the artistic and social stir of the nineteenth century, just as an hour's desultory browsing in a Shakespearian set throws the reader right into the life of the Elizabethans. Regarded from such a standpoint, the excerpts are of great profit. The catalogue of them for use in the annual Wagnerian fund concerts could well be extended to include at least one more than now available. The music from the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," for example, arranged by a judicious hand, ought to make an acceptable selection. The fact that a large part of the public knows certain of the dramas in their complete form and is likely in the coming seasons to know still others, makes the idea not less but more desirable. A purely orchestral reading of Wagner's scores though perhaps not advisable in regular symphony concerts, is in place in popular concerts.

BOSTON POST.

MARCH 14, 1914

LONG PROGRAMME

Symphony by Chadwick and Goldmark's Tone Poem Performed Before Paderewski's Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of insufferable length—the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—brought its reward yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. Paderewski stepped upon the platform and gave a memorable performance of his own piano concerto. The programme had this peculiarity: that it contained music either new or unknown to the majority of the present generation, and that this music was by living composers, and that all these composers were present in person to witness the reception of their compositions.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in F-major, George W. Chadwick; tone-poem, "Samson," (Mss.) Rubin Goldmark; piano concerto in A-minor, Ignace Paderewski. Soloist, Mr. Paderewski.

The short and happy career of Otto Urack's symphony No. 1 was enjoyed last week. That unfortunate symphony was wildly applauded. Mr. Chadwick's F-major symphony is better music. With an admirable sense of proportion, ratio, the audience applauded it a little less than half as heartily as it applauded Mr. Urack's ingenuous effort. The symphony by Chadwick is fully three-fifths better than the symphony by Urack. It is the work of an accomplished musician, a workman who knows his tools and what he intends to accomplish with them, and a workman with an honest and estimable regard for laws of form and principles of classic beauty. The symphony, it is true, is verbose; the material does not warrant its extension. Nevertheless, the workmanship holds it together, and the first movement, and Scherzo, especially, are composed lustily, the orchestra, throughout, making a brave sound.

Why do we not hear Mr. Chadwick's Melpomene overture, a composition, as one recalls it in retrospect, which is equally strong in its musical content and dramatic in its character, or the second symphony in B flat, by authoritative report, a far more individual and distinctive work than the symphony heard yesterday?

Goldmark's "Samson"

Mr. Goldmark, whose overture, "Hiawatha," made an excellent impression when heard here in 1900 and in 1906—a youthful work, it is true, but full of feeling and atmosphere—tells us in the programme book that his intention in writing "Samson" was an attempt to portray the broad moods of the Delilah episode, and its attendant circumstances. If so, why "detached chords in the woodwind and brass" to show Samson's "tugging at the temple walls," and other effects of themes and counterthemes, laboriously contrived, and only to be appreciated by the average hearer after a minute acquaintance with each theme and its meaning?

Mr. Goldmark, a musician, of the most serious aims and sincerity of purpose, looks back upon his "Hiawatha" as an early and immature work. It may be that, but we are bound to confess that at a first hearing the music heard yesterday is for us more labored, less significant and less eloquent in the portrayal of moods.

Paderewski's Own Piece

Then Mr. Paderewski, composer-pianist, stepped upon the stage. His concerto is a vehicle for a pianist, but it is a well made vehicle, and after the modern manner. Not all pianists write in this way when they write for themselves. This is from the note of William Foster Apthorp, quoted in the programme book: "Although the work was written by a pianist, by far the greater part of its musical structure and development is confided to the orchestra and comparatively little to the pianoforte. By this it is not meant that the pianoforte is not almost constantly doing something, but . . . he invariably gives it that to do which it can do best, and generally, that which it alone can do."

Mr. Paderewski played like a creator. He is apparently in the pink of technical condition. He played as probably no pianist since Rubinstein has played, with extraordinary rythm and elan, with indescribable tones, with a prodigious command of the utmost resources of his instrument. His piano was a second orchestra, having its own instrumental colors and its own instrumental style. It supplemented the second orchestra, and such was the prowess of the performer and the manner in which he had scored his work, that it seemed as though the piano was bearing up the orchestra, rather than the great body of instruments supporting and augmenting the tone of the piano.

A Marvellous Performance

Here, indeed, Mr. Paderewski came, saw and conquered! If his work had been less immediately effective than it is, it would have been made electrifying by his performance. Thanks to Dr. Muck, most of the solo performances at the Symphony concerts assume a remarkable balanced, homogenous and symphonic character. Yesterday, again, Dr. Muck provided an accompaniment for the gods, but now it was the man at the piano who commanded, while others obeyed. And what a marvellous thing, under such circumstances, is the play of nerves and muscles and tendons of steel! When the fingers are as sure and firm and velvety as the paw of a lion, simply a sort of inspired mechanism for which nothing is impossible, [illegible] fulfil [illegible]

HERALD.
MARCH 14. 1914.

PADEREWSKI AND MUCK VIE IN ELOQUENCE

Rare Combination of Artists Seen at Symphony Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 18th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Paderewski was the soloist. The program was as follows: Chadwick, Symphony No. 3, F-major; Rubin Goldmark, Tone Poem "Samson" (MS.); Paderewski, piano concerto in A-minor.

Mr. Chadwick's symphony, which won for him a prize in 1894, was played for the first time at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in October of that year. It was to many yesterday an unfamiliar work. Harsh things have been said about prize compositions, and the strictures upon them have often been just, but this symphony was thoughtfully conceived and the ideas were carefully elaborated.

Edward MacDowell once said to me that of all the Americans writing music at the time, Mr. Chadwick had the finest sense of form and the greatest contrapuntal facility. The workmanship displayed in this sympathy is solid; the musical thoughts are clearly and definitely expressed; the thematic development is logical. That portions of the work show the influence of Brahms—the influence is strongly marked in the first movement—is not to the discredit of the composer of 20 years ago. No doubt Mr. Chadwick would write a symphony today in another vein, for the prevailing musical speech now has a different idiom. In 1894 only an academic work would have obtained a prize from a New York conservatory.

Mr. Rubin Goldmark, born in New York and now living there, was favorably known here by his overture to "Hiawatha," which has been played at Symphony concerts, and by chamber music brought out by the Kneisels. He is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, but there is little orientalism in "Samson." This symphonic poem endeavors to portray in tones the character of the hero, his undoing at the hands of Delilah, and the vengeance taken by the blind prisoner on the Philistines. In his notes Mr. Goldmark says that the composition is intended to be "programmatic only in its broadest outlines." Nevertheless, there are passages that are supposed to picture certain details of the story, as Samson's "tugging at the temple walls."

Mr. Goldmark is a well grounded musician. He thinks for himself. Musical ideas are his own, and so is his manner of expression. Unfortunately in this symphonic poem the various themes are not strongly impressive. Would it not have been better to announce the Samson motive at once, and might it not have a more heroic character? The music that is supposed to portray Delilah is not sensuous or irresistibly seductive. No one of the chief motives has a decided profile. And in all the sections, whether there is portrayal of character and moods or pictorially descriptive music there is an absence of imaginative force. "Samson" is carefully worked out, one might say laboriously; but there is little to hold the attention of the hearer; there is little that makes a decided impression.

Mr. Paderewski's concerto was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julie Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston. When Mr. Pederewski first visited the city in 1891 he played his concerto. Coming to Boston in 1893 he played it again and four years afterward Mr. Alberto Jonas gave a performance of it. Yesterday this work seemed fresh, modern, beautiful, exciting. It is perhaps unfortunate for the concerto itself that Mr. Paderewski plays it, for what other pianist can do it justice?

The performance was a memorable one in every way. Mr. Paderewski was fully in the vein. Never has he been here more romantically brilliant. Never has he played with more irresistible rhythmic feeling or with more beautiful quality of tone. His exquisite cantilena was as remarkable as his demoniacal bravura.

It is doubtful whether Mr. Paderewski has ever had a more sympathetic and inspiring accompaniment. Accompaniment is hardly the word, for, as Mr. Apthorp pointed out long ago in his analysis of this concerto, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra.

In the performance the orchestra vied with the pianist in splendor of eloquence, and Dr. Muck played on this orchestra as Mr. Paderewski played on the piano. There was this rare combination; the music itself was worthy of pianist, conductor and orchestra, all exulting in the revelation of art, all virtuosos imbued with the purest musical spirit and inspired by the divine frenzy that distinguishes the true artist in words, music, painting or sculpture from the accomplished and highly respectable artisan.

There was the customary scene of enthusiasm and Mr. Paderewski was generous as ever in responding to the imperative demand.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts of March 27 and 28 will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony in B flat major; d'Indy, "A Summer Day on the Mountain"; Rinsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
MARCH 14, 1914

Pianist Appears at Symphony Rehearsal Interpreting His Concerto in A Minor—"Samson" Tone Poem Is Produced

RECALL MUSIC GIVEN

Presenting his own concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor, Ignace J. Paderewski appeared as soloist at the eighteenth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and won the applause of a capacity house. As has happened before when Mr. Paderewski was the Symphony visiting artist, the concerto was the last number on the program and at its close the audience and the men of the orchestra, remaining in their places, recalled him to play something from his recital repertory. The selections that preceded the solo number were Chadwick's symphony No. 3 in F major and a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark, entitled "Samson," which was played from manuscript and was given its first performance.

Boston audiences are hospitable to performers who present their own compositions. They are open-minded both to the new work of their local composers and to that of music-makers who come from afar. The Symphony public is always ready to give heed to members of the orchestra who have written something and want a hearing for it. Doubtless an artist of Mr. Paderewski's distinction pays a compliment to Bostonians when he plays his concerto before them. The manner of the Polish pianist with his audiences and his attitude in general toward the American musical public indicates that he likes to play only where he has his house entirely with him. It is to be inferred, then, that he must like to present his own compositions only where they are attentively received.

Though the music of Paderewski is seldom in the programs of the piano recitalists who appear through the season, there are unquestionably many artists who study his pieces with zeal and many listeners who like them. There was earnest interpretation and keen appreciation of this very concerto in A minor when Miss Gulick of Cambridge played it at a fortnightly meeting of the Chromatic Club this winter. It is the kind of music that holds the ear. It is one of the most logical compositions ever penned. And yet, like so much of the Paderewski-written product, not excepting the vast symphony in B minor, which was produced in Boston in the time of Max Fiedler, it is comparatively messageless.

But Mr. Paderewski did more than hold the respectful attention of the matinee audience. He succeeded, though playing music which merely sounded and did not speak, in charming his listeners. His technique gave a pleasure which his concerto could not give. There was an abstract esthetic in the performance which is a rare manifestation at concerts and has a value not to be scorned.

The new composition of Goldmark was remarkable for carrying out faithfully, and in a manner that the listener could not help following with the help of the program notes, a dramatic plot. There was nothing striking in descriptive effect in the episodes, except possibly the fall of the temple. And it was all the more truthfully program music for this reason. It dealt more with the different states of sentiment developed in Samson and Delilah as their drama progressed than with their actual doings. The composition has a program of emotion rather than one of action, and it is a far more reasonable effort to make music one of the arts of representation than is usually heard. It breaks with the Berlioz method of making music do the work of language. It recognizes that the orchestra can recount happenings only by the indirect method of telling how they affect the feelings of the actors.

TRANSCRIPT.
MARCH 14, 1914

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. PADEREWSKI AS COMPOSER AND PIANIST

He Revives His Magnificent Concerto and Plays It as Magnificently—The Qualities of Man and Musician That Run Through Both—Dr. Muck's and the Orchestra's Eloquent Share—Two Pieces for Pleasant or Dull Preluding

IN more than the usual sense of the words, when Mr. Paderewski plays with the Symphony Orchestra, the concert of yesterday afternoon became his concert. As usual, he had the final place on the programme seemingly that the rule which forbids encore pieces at the Symphony Concerts might be broken—as ostentatiously broken as possible. Other pianists and violinists of the first rank, like Mr. Bauer and Mr. Hofmann, like Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Kreisler, play their concertos in their normal place, the middle of the programme, and neither they nor their audience expect "extra pieces." Yet whenever Mr. Paderewski returns to the Symphony Concerts he receives the opportunity to give a recital in miniature as a kind of pendant to the afternoon or the evening. Does he ask the privilege or has the exercise of it become a habit with him and with all concerned? Certainly, after such magnificent music as his own concerto played as magnificently as he, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it yesterday, the "extra pieces," amiable and interesting enough in their way and exquisitely sung, seemed paltry and anomalous enough.

It is not altogether to the credit of Mr. Paderewski's standards, as virtuoso, as man of the world, as a generally fine-fibred spirit that he should so confuse the functions of a pianist at a symphony concert and in a recital of his own. No more is it to the credit of Symphony Hall that it breaks a rule established through twenty-five years for Mr. Paderewski and no other. Either the rule should hold steadily or—absit omen—it should be relaxed for others equally deserving. Perhaps, however, Mr. Kreisler or Mr. Bauer, being of a younger and more austere generation, do not care for that sort of thing. Meanwhile audiences rejoice greatly.

If the concert was Mr. Paderewski's by the titles of his presence, his masterly concerto and his own masterful playing, it was also by the quality and the interest of the pieces that made preface to him. One was Mr. Chadwick's "prize" symphony in F, revived for the first time in many seasons; the other was Rubin Goldmark's tone-poem, "Samson" played for the first time at any concerts. The symphony is pleasurable enough music to hear. In 1894, as now, Mr. Chadwick is at ease in the Zion of the symphonic form; he develops his melodies without too much labor and with mild interest—in the present symphony—for those that watchfully wait upon the process; his harmonies are agreeable, contributing to the melodies in the old way rather than making a mere background for them in the newest fashion; his instrumental palette has engaging tints. Moreover in all this symphony of the nineties and for a prize, Mr. Chadwick writes in a pleasant flow of spirits. His melodies seem amiably and readily invented, if they have no obvious distinction, arresting beauty or penetrating emotional power. If they had been such, they would not have been in the vein of such a relatively simple and ingratiating piece. As it is, they range from musing sentiment to gay animation and sturdy songfulness, and they bear agreeably the transformations that mood as well as manipulation accomplishes with them. If their progress through the symphony does not engross the listener—much less move him—it does amuse him in the inner sense of the word. He hears the music as he might hear an amiable, varied and rather genteel conversation about nothing of much moment in which the talkers are led shrewdly by Mr. Chadwick and have as adept tongues as those of Dr. Muck and his men. It is the custom to say that Mr. Chadwick's music has its American flavor. Perhaps the American touch in this symphony—for we are a race of incorrigible and rather futile talkers—is its air of an agreeable conversation in tones.

Mr. Goldmark's tone-poem sought other and more exacting ends and on one side at least fell far short of them. His purpose is clear enough; to invent melodies that should characterize Samson and Delilah, to derive other incidental motives from them that should still further disclose the Hebrew and the Philistine and then to develop all this material in such fashion that it should unfold the biblical legend through the temptation and the yielding of the hero to the final destruction of the temple at his hands. So far as the development and the manipulation of motives goes, Mr. Goldmark fulfils his purpose skilfully and according to the Lisztian and other precepts for a symphonic poem. He knows his process; but he cannot impart the smallest delineative vividness or imaginative heat to it. As he recounts the tale of Samson and Delilah in tones, so it might be recounted on a suburban porch, when the young ladies were present and holding hands. His melodies in themselves are still more barren of invention, imagination and character. They do not summon Samson or Delilah or scarcely one of their attributes. They are merely perfunctory and arbitrary material for thoughtful music-making. Not often at a Symphony concert has music seemed so obviously

After such a sorry tone-poem, the thrilling contrast of the beauty, the power, the marshalled eloquence of Mr. Paderewski's concerto as the pianist himself, Dr. Muck and each and every man of the orchestra played it. For fifteen years and more the music has not been heard here, since no self-respecting pianist could possibly play a concerto written by another pianist of his own generation. One and all they grieve over the lack of a contemporary concerto, worthy of their powers, deserving in itself and likely to stir their audiences. Mr. Paderewski's is such a concerto and much more; for twenty years it has lain ready to their hands, the work of his young prime; but they will not touch it because forsooth another pianist of their own time wrote it. Of such is the artistic temperament in the virtuoso. Peace to it, or rather the perturbation that it more craves.

Moreover in this concerto, as in the Variations and Fugue and as, in less degree in the Polish Fantasia and the Piano Sonata, Mr. Paderewski, if he would might see his ambitions as a composer fulfilled. His opera, upon which he lavished the power of his maturity, failed and is forgotten because in it he courted a musical genre alien to him. His symphony came and went, because with all his effort he seemed inarticulate in it. But the Variations and Fugue are already accounted among the masterpieces of music for the piano written in our time and highly characteristic of the composer who wrote them. The Polish Fantasia and the Sonata fall only a little below them. They bid fair to endure "in the literature of the instrument" and when once Mr. Paderewski ceases to be a "rival," ambitious pianists can play them without detriment to their precious vanity.

Above these pieces for the present climax of Mr. Paderewski's composing, though he wrote it late in his twenties, rises the concerto that he played yesterday. He planned and accomplished it with large, clear and unflagging sense of design. It has the essential quality of "real" music of large dimensions that it seems to rise out of itself by its own creative and propulsive power. It holds piano and orchestra in close and clear relation; it incorporates the ostensible solo instrument with the band; yet it gives each the share in the stalment and the development of the music that it may best discharge, and much as it varies the union, it never dissevers or even forces it. When he wrote his symphony Mr. Paderewski laboriously study and fashioned his harmonies and timbres. In the concerto he teems with quick instrumental imagination. Similarly his melodies seem to spring into as instant and complete being. They have songful beauty as in the Andante; they are with musical life as in the Finale; they are finely and variously eloquent as in Allegro. As Mr. Paderewski sets them forth, transforms and develops them, yet warmer and richer becomes his imagination with them. At one extreme it weaves glawing araberques for the piano; at the it touches the orchestra with rhythmic fires and sets it marching in larger and larger sonorities; while between it is the voice of serene or passionate and always of nobly eloquent song. Mr. Paderewski is writing from mind and heart to mind and heart, and as a master of the projecting medium.

As such a master and with many a dart of the divine fire, such as used to flash at his call and has flashed this winter in only one of his preceding concerts here, Mr. Paderewski played his music yesterday. In these days when after he seems at odds with himself, with the world, with his music and with his instrument, at last he seemed to stand free and controlled again. All that he woud express in the concerto, he had been able to write within it. All that he would draw forth from it, he could impart undiminished. He has his days of struggle, as irritating to himself; yesterday came the day of full and free achievement. He wrote in the concerto in "the grand style" and in "the grand style," when it is most exalted and eloquent he played it. He wove his arabesques like magnificent festoons of tone about melodies that Dr. Muck and the orchestra were proclaiming as magnificently. Or taking the melodies to the piano's self, he sung them with more intensifying voice until the beauty and the power of the song was an emotion itself.

O yet again, as in the Finale, pianist, the conductor and the orchestra with one accord and as by a common transport, plunged into a rhapsody of seeming improvisation. To the brilliance of the piano and the pianist, orchestra and conductor answered as brilliantly. The music darted or whirled to its rhythms; it flung out splintered phrases like showers of stars; or the melody recovered for the instant, made its broad path of light, and then reeled away again to shower its power into more and more beauty. Yesterday, for once, the youngest generation knew teh heroic Paderewski, puissant, manifold, exhaustless, conquering.

H. T. P.

BOSTON AMERICAN, MARCH 14, 1914

Paderewski Wins Symphony Applause

Jan Paderewski, whose press agent or somebody acting as such has been reporting from various parts of the country as about to break down from nervous prostration as a result of black hand threats, appeared with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

He appeared in his usual robust health and the only approach to a breakdown came from the piano, which he pounded in his good old-fashioned way. Paderewski played his own concerto, a work which is brilliant and beautiful in many places and full of the most surprising technical requirements.

As usual, he was wildly applauded. The concerto was admirably played both by the soloist and orchestra. Chadwick's attractive Symphony was upon the bill yesterday for the first time in a long time. This work is now nearly twenty years old. Its themes are pleasant and its construction scholarly.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,

MARCH 14, 1914.

PADEREWSKI HAS A UNIQUE TRIUMPH

People Wait All Day to Hear Him in Concert and Impromptu Recital.

By E. F. Harkins.

All rules and records fall before Paderewski. Enthusiasts gathered as early as 8 o'clock yesterday morning outside Symphony Hall to see the most brilliant star of the musical world make his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra since February, 1909, and they remained in the hall until 5.15, nine and a quarter hours later, to plead with applause for another encore.

When the "All Seats Sold" sign was hung up early in the afternoon, the line of hopeful hero-worshipers extended from the Massachusetts avenue entrance around to Huntington avenue and up almost to Gainsboro street. The house could have been sold half over again. And after the Symphony concert, in which the pianistic superman took the solo part in the performance of his own beautiful concerto in A minor, the ironclad no-encore rule was suspended for the first time since Paderewski was here before, and for nearly three-quarters of an hour the master pianist of the times gave an impromptu recital.

A tone pastel by Couperin, given with infinite grace, was the first extra, and then came pieces by Schumann and others. It was all worth waiting for—even in the case of those who hurried to the hall after breakfast and took their lunches with them to consume unabashed upon the steps.

And now Paderewski is himself again. The three weeks' rest in the golden West have cured him of his nervousness and restored his good humor. Yesterday he played in his old-time form, with scarcely any detonations, such as marred his tone at the recital he gave here last fall, and with that perfection of technique and melting loveliness of tone that sustain his supremacy among the pianists of the day and give music-lovers pleasure beyond compare.

The concert yesterday would have been memorable if nothing had been played except the concerto, for the composition is so designed that the orchestra has as important a part as the soloist, and the men under Dr. Muck performed their share con amore and with an artistry fairly rivaling that of the composer-pianist himself.

Paderewski has often said that the Boston orchestra is the finest in the world, and yesterday he seemed to be reflecting upon this very compliment as he listened to the exquisite performance of the various solo passages in the charming romanza forming the second movement of the concerto.

America was strongly represented in the program. The third symphony of George W. Chadwick of Boston was revived, and a new tone poem, "Samson," by Rubin Goldmark of New York, was given its first performance.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 14.

PADERESWSKI SOLOIST AT 18TH REHEARSAL

Plays Finale of His A Minor Concerto Dramatically.

Rubin Goldmark's "Samson" for the First Time Anywhere.

The 18th Symphony rehearsal occurred yesterday afternoon. Mr Paderewski was the soloist. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Chadwick..............3d Symphony, F major
Rubin Goldmark............Tone Poem Samson
First performance.
Paderewski...........A minor concerto, op 17

Mr Paderewski kept the audience waiting—Dr Muck included—for his usual impressive entrance. With a conductor of less distinction on the stand it necessarily would have been less impressive. Mr Paderewski also gave an exceedingly dramatic performance in the last movement of his concerto, music in which the piano is made an orchestral instrument with others, a performance in which conductor was quite as much the virtuoso as the soloist.

In the song of the slow movement and in the cadenza, Mr Paderewski also forced a hard and wiry tone and was guilty of slovenly and ragged attack, which in Miss Mary Jones, an obscure young debutante recitalist, would have been roundly roasted the next morning. It was a pleasure to hear music by Mr Chadwick in which there is scholarship and virility without the loss of dignity. The promulgation of any score which invites the upright and self-righteous to a consideration of Delilah, stimulating and amiable woman in and out of opera houses, is to be encouraged.

Mr Goldmark has written amiable music. Although he has chosen a storied theme, and has four subtitles—the tone poem is played without pause—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," "The Temple"—he is to be thanked for not insisting upon an arbitrary program. We are not compelled, for example, to note the exact moment when Samson is sheared, nor are we enlightened as to what then happens, a point which neither the performances at the Boston Opera House nor the pages of Holy Writ have made plain.

The composer has chosen musical motives to be representatives of his protagonists. That which is to lift the veil from Delilah's face first is heard in the English horn and solo viola, two instruments successful in inducing thoughts of the Orient. The clarinet later discources of her. The material symbolical of Sampson is less characteristic. There is little to suggest the mighty warrior of Israel, a man of great devotion to his cause, who should not be judged too harshly for certain moral lapses. There was no clear differentiation between the two characters, who invite well-defined characterization.

Mr Goldmark is no novice with an orchestra. He knows how to group instruments and set off a single voice or a choir. He has contrapuntal facility, and is not without invention or skill in development. His harmonic scheme is colorful without being bizarre or acrid. He knows the saving power to the ear of a long melodic line, and of incisive accentuation. His work is well scored and the product of thoughtful and skilled effort, but not of inevitable or commanding inspiration.

Mr Paderewski was permitted to play encores, a special dispensation at these concerts made only to a few of the immortals. He continued them until what was said to be a late hour. The first of these—which might have been variations upon an air by an early French or Italian classicist—was welcome, for here Mr Paderewski demanded of the piano those things which it can give, and played with continence and beauty of style. While the last movement has a sweeping and barbaric fury his concerto is not to be taken too seriously as music. Mr Paderewski showed that he still can be volcanic as a technician. The chief pleasure in the preformance was the euphony of the orchestra and the purity of style for example of Mr Longy's playing. Fortunately there are instruments that must be kept within the dynamic frame for which they were intended.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 14

PADEREWSKI WITH THE SYMPHO

POLISH PIANIST WINS HIS USUAL TRIU

Chadwick's Third Symphony Orchestral Work This W Goldmark's "Samson."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick..............Third Symphony, F majo
Rubin Goldmark............"Samson." Tone-poe
Paderewski..............Piano Concerto, A minor
Pianist, Mr. Paderewski.

The matter can be told in a nutshell,—Paderewski, the pianist,—!!!! Paderewski, the composer,—???? It is given to very few to be, like Liszt, great as pianist and as composer. Even Rubinstein stood higher as an artist than as a creator in Music. Paderewski's works are chiefly successful when Paderewski himself plays or directs them. His symphony, his opera "Manru," his concerto, his sonata (but not his little Minuet), rely upon personal prestige in a large de[illegible] but that prestige is so over- [illegible] that it would [illegible] worthy works

For there is skill, talent, and learning in all of Paderewski's works in the large forms, but scarcely a fine frenzy of inspiration. But it was quite enough for the general public that Paderewski was to play, had he played scales and Schmitt's Five-finger exercises the result would have been the same, and the waiting crowd of rush-seaters began to gather in the early morning, while before the doors were opened the line extended far into the adjacent streets.

Let us add at once that his piano-playing is worth all the excitement it creates. No man alive has such boundless versatility, such a keen perception of different emotions in music and such a faculty of portraying them. There need be no question as regards the right to the title of "greatest living pianist."

There had been rumors of illness, of nervous prostration, of abandonment of the American tour, but there were no evidences of this in yesterday afternoon's work. We have sometimes found fault with his freedom of interpretation in certain of the classics and considered him an unsafe guide to the piano student; but on this occasion he was ruler in his own kingdom, the work was his own and he had a right to lay down the law as to the points of its interpretation. He made sharp contrasts, but the outline was clear, the form was intelligible. He gave tremendous force at times, but we are past the epoch when this may be denied to the modern pianist at a modern piano.

In short Paderewski was at his very best, and although he began after the audience had had one hour and a half of very earnest music, he aroused them at once to something like frenzied enthusiasm.

Nor is the concerto that he composed and played to be slighted altogether. Its first movement is very effective and the piano is welded into the orchestral score in a most commendable manner. Dr. Muck and his men evidently caught the enthusiasm that was in the air, and supported the pianist nobly.

The work falls off in interest in the last two movements, but the wonderful playing of Paderewski in the finale was bound to have its result, and at the end of the programme no one seemed to make an exit, even the musicians remained in their seats. Everybody seemed to know what it meant to place Paderewski at the end of a symphonic programme, and the demand for "more" became irresistible. Therefore we left the great pianist giving a series of delightful encores. With these, at a symphony concert, we have nought to do.

Musically considered, Mr. Chadwick's symphony was the best part of the programme, even if we somewhat prefer the second symphony to the third. We consider Mr. Chadwick the first among American composers, for he has an amount of contrapuntal skill that is equal to that of any American, yet he never allows this skill to rule him, to lead him into pedantry. His geniality is always marked; he is spontaneous even in the most exacting forms. Luther once said of Des Prest "Others are ruled by the notes; only Des Pres rules the notes." Somewhat in this manner has Mr. Chadwick digested the rules of composition.

Note that this symphony was concise, a very rare virtue in a modern work. It is written for "classical orchestra" (plus trombones and tuba), not one unusual instrument appearing. That the composer was not forced to this conservatism the great score of his "Aphrodite" may show. Note also that the symphonic shape is not mangled, it is "regelrecht" and can be measured by the classical yard-stick, yet it expresses modern thoughts. The freedom of rhythmic treatment in the first movement shows this at the very beginning.

Yet we find the third symphony less inspired and inspiring than the great overtures or the "Aphrodite" of this composer. One admired the surety of the development of themes, the contrapuntal touches of the finale, and the Scherzo with its beautiful trio won even popular success; but as a whole the symphony is less spontaneous than other of Mr. Chadwick's works and too subtle in treatment for general popularity. Yet Dr. Muck was twice recalled at its close.

In speaking of Mr. Chadwick's symphony it may not be amiss to speak a word of tribute to a publisher who is quietly doing very much to advance the cause of American music. This symphony, the second symphony, the tone-poem "Aphrodite," and other American orchestral scores have been printed by Arthur P. Schmidt, an undertaking that involves considerable self-sacrifice in a country so young in orchestral matters as America.

From SUN
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date FEB 21 1914

1884

NEXT SEASON'S SERIES.

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts, to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close. The list of attractions includes Mme. Olive Fremstad; Pasquale Amato, baritone of the Metropolitan; Julia Culp, lieder singer; Harold Bauer, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Dr. Karl Muck with the Boston Symphony.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 15 1914

E 1884

[illegible] Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America 20-odd years ago, but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 1888 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvellous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90s, and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete programme. The symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful scherzo, which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire programme early in the [illegible]

R

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 12 1914

Est 1884

PADEREWSKI GIVEN UNUSUAL OVATION

Boston Symphony Presents Fine Program at Fifth and Last Concert.

PROGRAM

Brahms,
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Strauss,
Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguratoin"), Op. 24
Paderewski,
Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Conductor........Dr. Carl Muck
Soloist........................Paderewski

Paderewski again demonstrated how unselfish he is with his art at the Academy of Music last evening, where he was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number being the last on the program, it gave the audience the opportunity for a display of enthusiasm as is only called out when Paderewski plays. He showed his willingness to distribute as much favor as he received, by playing two encores. He indulged his audience as freely as the aspiring artist, and broke the cast-iron Boston Symphony rule of no encores, which seems to imply but when Paderewski plays.

Two Encores Played.

After the long concerto in A minor of Paderewski's own composition, the vast audience remained seated and called him out a number of times, and when they noticed his move to the piano the applause was accompanied with cheers. His first encore was Rubenstein's beautiful "Barcarole." Applause and cheers followed and he was again called out repeatedly, and when for the second time he approached the piano, fully three-fourths of the audience were still in their seats and he played Liszt's familiar "Second Rhapsodie." Each selection he preceded with a number of chords until there was perfect quiet in the meantime glancing about to see that everyone was in absolute repose.

Dr. Muck a Brahms Enthusiast.

No comment is necessary as to Paderewski's art. It remains unapproachable and unquestioned as to its finish and as to everything embraced in that word. The concert, on the whole, was one of the most delightful ever given by the Boston Symphony in this city. The symphony was Brahms' E Minor, No. 4. That Dr. Muck is partial to Brahms is shown in his selection of two symphonies by that composer for his five concerts here this year.

Brahms has not come to be fully understood and appreciated by the large body of music-lovers, and the Fourth is exclusively for the Brahmsites, who applaud whether it be of gold, silver, copper or brass that is being presented. This symphony is full of silvery bars of melody, especially the second movement, but the brass does not enter until the finale.

Dr. Muck gave a spirited reading of the great work and the audience applauded vigorously and repeatedly called him back, when he finally directed the orchestra to stand and share with him in the enthusiasm. The always appreciated tone poem by Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung," was the other number, which was played with excellent taste.

BOSTON AMERICAN, MARCH 14, 1914.

Paderewski Wins Symphony Applause

Jan Paderewski, whose press agent or somebody acting as such has been reporting from various parts of the country as about to break down from nervous prostration as a result of black hand threats, appeared with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

He appeared in his usual robust health and the only approach to a breakdown came from the piano, which he pounded in his good old-fashioned way. Paderewski played his own concerto, a work which is brilliant and beautiful in many places and full of the most surprising technical requirements.

As usual, he was wildly applauded. The concerto was admirably played both by the soloist and orchestra. Chadwick's attractive Symphony was upon the bill yesterday for the first time in a long time. This work is now nearly twenty years old. Its themes are pleasant and its construction scholarly.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY.

MARCH 14, 1914.

PADERESWKI HAS A UNIQUE TRIUMPH

People Wait All Day to Hear Him in Concert and Impromptu Recital.

By E. F. Harkins.

All rules and records fall before Paderewski. Enthusiasts gathered as early as 8 o'clock yesterday morning outside Symphony Hall, to see the most brilliant star of the musical world make his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra since February, 1909, and they remained in the hall until 5.15, nine and a quarter hours later, to plead with applause for another encore.

When the "All Seats Sold" sign was hung up early in the afternoon, the line of hopeful hero-worshipers extended from the Massachusetts avenue entrance around to Huntington avenue and up almost to Gainsboro street. The house could have been sold half over again. And after the Symphony concert, in which the pianistic superman took the solo part in the performance of his own beautiful concerto in A minor, the ironclad no-encore rule was suspended for the first time since Paderewski was here before, and for nearly three-quarters of an hour the master pianist of the times gave an impromptu recital.

A tone pastel by Couperin, given with infinite grace, was the first extra, and then came pieces by Schumann and others. It was all worth waiting for—even in the case of those who hurried to the hall after breakfast and took their lunches with them to consume unabashed upon the steps.

And now Paderewski is himself again. The three weeks' rest in the golden West have cured him of his nervousness and restored his good humor. Yesterday he played in his old-time form, with scarely any detonations, such as marred his tone at the recital he gave here last fall, and with that perfection of technique and melting loveliness of tone that sustain his supremacy among the pianists of the day and give music-lovers pleasure beyond compare.

The concert yesterday would have been memorable if nothing had been played except the concerto, for the composition is so designed that the orchestra has as important a part as the soloist, and the men under Dr. Muck performed their share con amore and with an artistry fairly rivaling that of the composer-pianist himself.

Paderewski has often said that the Boston orchestra is the finest in the world, and yesterday he seemed to be reflecting upon this very compliment as he listened to the exquisite performance of the various solo passages in the charming romanza forming the second movement of the concerto.

America was strongly represented in the program. The third symphony of George W. Chadwick of Boston was revived, and a new tone poem, "Samson," by Rubin Goldmark of New York, was given its first performance.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 14.

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST AT 18TH REHEARSAL

Plays Finale of His A Minor Concerto Dramatically.

Rubin Goldmark's "Samson" for the First Time Anywhere.

The 18th Symphony rehearsal occurred yesterday afternoon. Mr Paderewski was the soloist. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Chadwick..............3d Symphony, F major
Rubin Goldmark............Tone Poem Samson
First performance.
Paderewski...........A minor concerto, op 17

Mr Paderewski kept the audience waiting—Dr Muck included—for his usual impressive entrance. With a conductor of less distinction on the stand it necessarily would have been less impressive. Mr Paderewski also gave an exceedingly dramatic performance in the last movement of his concerto, music in which the piano is made an orchestral instrument with others, a performance in which conductor was quite as much the virtuoso as the soloist.

In the song of the slow movement and in the cadenza, Mr Paderewski also forced a hard and wiry tone and was guilty of slovenly and ragged attack, which in Miss Mary Jones, an obscure young debutante recitalist, would have been roundly roasted the next morning. It was a pleasure to hear music by Mr Chadwick in which there is scholarship and virility without the loss of dignity. The promulgation of any score which invites the upright and self-righteous to a consideration of Delilah, stimulating and amiable woman in and out of opera houses, is to be encouraged.

Mr Goldmark has written amiable music. Although he has chosen a storied theme, and has four subtitles—the tone poem is played without pause—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," "The Temple"—he is to be thanked for not insisting upon an arbitrary program. We are not compelled, for example, to note the exact moment when Samson is sheared, nor are we enlightened as to what then happens, a point which neither the performances at the Boston Opera House nor the pages of Holy Writ have made plain.

The composer has chosen musical motives to be representatives of his protagonists. That which is to lift the veil from Delilah's face first is heard in the English horn and solo viola, two instruments successful in inducing thoughts of the Orient. The clarinet later discources of her. The material symbolical of Sampson is less characteristic. There is little to suggest the mighty warrior of Israel, a man of great devotion to his cause, who should not be judged too harshly for certain moral lapses. There was no clear differentiation between the two characters, who invite well-defined characterization.

Mr Goldmark is no novice with an orchestra. He knows how to group instruments and set off a single voice or a choir. He has contrapuntal facility, and is not without invention or skill in development. His harmonic scheme is colorful without being bizarre or acrid. He knows the saving power to the ear of a long melodic line, and of incisive accentuation. His work is well scored and the product of thoughtful and skilled effort, but not of inevitable or commanding inspiration.

Mr Paderewski was permitted to play encores, a special dispensation at these concerts made only to a few of the immortals. He continued them until what was said to be a late hour. The first of these—which might have been variations upon an air by an early French or Italian classicist—was welcome, for here Mr Paderewski demanded of the piano those things which it can give, and played with continence and beauty of style. While the last movement has a sweeping and barbaric fury his concerto is not to be taken too seriously as music. Mr Paderewski showed that he still can be volcanic as a technician. The chief pleasure in the preformance was the euphony of the orchestra and the purity of style for example of Mr Longy's playing. Fortunately there are instruments that must be kept within the dynamic frame for which they were intended.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 14

PADEREWSKI WITH THE SYMPHO

POLISH PIANIST WINS HIS USUAL TRIU

Chadwick's Third Symphony Orchestral Work This W Goldmark's "Samson."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick...............Third Symphony, F majo
Rubin Goldmark............"Samson." Tone-poen
Paderewski..............Piano Concerto, A minor
Pianist, Mr. Paderewski.

The matter can be told in a nutshell,—Paderewski, the pianist,—!!!! Paderewski, the composer,—???? It is given to very few to be, like Liszt, great as pianist and as composer. Even Rubinstein stood higher as an artist than as a creator in Music. Paderewski's works are chiefly successful when Paderewski himself plays or directs them. His symphony, his opera "Manru," his concerto, his sonata (but not his little Minuet), rely upon personal prestige in a large degree, but that prestige is so overwhelming that it would float far less worthy works

For there is skill, talent, and learning in all of Paderewski's works in the large forms, but scarcely a fine frenzy of inspiration. But it was quite enough for the general public that Paderewski was to play, had he played scales and Schmitt's Five-finger exercises the result would have been the same, and the waiting crowd of rush-seaters began to gather in the early morning, while before the doors were opened the line extended far into the adjacent streets.

Let us add at once that his piano-playing is worth all the excitement it creates. No man alive has such boundless versatility, such a keen perception of different emotions in music and such a faculty of portraying them. There need be no question as regards the right to the title of "greatest living pianist."

There had been rumors of illness, of nervous prostration, of abandonment of the American tour, but there were no evidences of this in yesterday afternoon's work. We have sometimes found fault with his freedom of interpretation in certain of the classics and considered him an unsafe guide to the piano student; but on this occasion he was ruler in his own kingdom, the work was his own and he had a right to lay down the law as to the points of its interpretation. He made sharp contrasts, but the outline was clear, the form was intelligible. He gave tremendous force at times, but we are past the epoch when this may be denied to the modern pianist at a modern piano.

In short Paderewski was at his very best, and although he began after the audience had had one hour and a half of very earnest music, he aroused them at once to something like frenzied enthusiasm.

Nor is the concerto that he composed and played to be slighted altogether. Its first movement is very effective and the piano is welded into the orchestral score in a most commendable manner. Dr. Muck and his men evidently caught the enthusiasm that was in the air, and supported the pianist nobly.

The work falls off in interest in the last two movements, but the wonderful playing of Paderewski in the finale was bound to have its result, and at the end of the programme no one seemed to make an exit, even the musicians remained in their seats. Everybody seemed to know what it meant to place Paderewski at the end of a symphonic programme, and the demand for "more" became irresistible. Therefore we left the great pianist giving a series of delightful encores. With these, at a symphony concert, we have nought to do.

Musically considered, Mr. Chadwick's symphony was the best part of the programme, even if we somewhat prefer the second symphony to the third. We consider Mr. Chadwick the first among American composers, for he has an amount of contrapuntal skill that is equal to that of any American, yet he never allows this skill to rule him, to lead him into pedantry. His geniality is always marked; he is spontaneous even in the most exacting forms. Luther once said of Des Pres: "Others are ruled by the notes; only Des Pres rules the notes." Somewhat in this manner has Mr. Chadwick digested the rules of composition.

Note that this symphony was concise, a very rare virtue in a modern work. It is written for "classical orchestra" (plus trombones and tuba), not one unusual instrument appearing. That the composer was not forced to this conservatism the great score of his "Aphrodite" may show. Note also that the symphonic shape is not mangled, it is "regelrecht" and can be measured by the classical yard-stick, yet it expresses modern thoughts. The freedom of rhythmic treatment in the first movement shows this at the very beginning.

Yet we find the third symphony less inspired and inspiring than the great overtures or the "Aphrodite" of this composer. One admired the surety of the development of themes, the contrapuntal touches of the finale, and the Scherzo with its beautiful trio won even popular success; but as a whole the symphony is less spontaneous than other of Mr. Chadwick's works and too subtle in treatment for general popularity. Yet Dr. Muck was twice recalled at its close.

In speaking of Mr. Chadwick's symphony it may not be amiss to speak a word of tribute to a publisher who is quietly doing very much to advance the cause of American music. This symphony, the second symphony, the tone-poem "Aphrodite," and other American orchestral scores have been printed by Arthur P. Schmidt, an undertaking that involves considerable self-sacrifice in a country so young in orchestral matters as America.

From SUN
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date [illegible]

1884

NEXT SEASON'S SERIES.

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts, to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close. The list of attractions includes Mme. Olive Fremstad; Pasquale Amato, baritone of the Metropolitan; Julia Culp, lieder singer; Harold Bauer, pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Dr. Karl Muck, with the Boston Symphony.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 15 1914

E 1884

Coming Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America 20-odd years ago, but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus. 17. Written in 1888 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvellous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90s, and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete programme. The symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful scherzo, which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire programme early in the week.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Est 1884

PADEREWSKI GIVEN UNUSUAL OVATION

Boston Symphony Presents Fine Program at Fifth and Last Concert.

PROGAM

Brahms,
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Strauss,
Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguratoin"), Op. 24
Padereweski,
Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Conductor........Dr. Carl Muck
Soloist.......................Paderewski

Paderewski again demonstrated how unselfish he is with his art at the Academy of Music last evening, where he was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number being the last on the program, it gave the audience the opportunity for a display of enthusiasm as is only called out when Paderewski plays. He showed his willingness to distribute as much favor as he received, by playing two encores. He indulged his audience as freely as the aspiring artist, and broke the cast-iron Boston Symphony rule of no encores, which seems to imply but when Paderewski plays.

Two Encores Played.

After the long concerto in A minor of Paderewski's own composition, the vast audience remained seated and called him out a number of times, and when they noticed his move to the piano the applause was accompanied with cheers. His first encore was Rubenstein's beautiful "Barcarole." Applause and cheers followed and he was again called out repeatedly, and when for the second time he approached the piano, fully three-fourths of the audience were still in their seats and he played Liszt's familiar "Second Rhapsodie." Each selection he preceded with a number of chords until there was perfect quiet, in the meantime glancing about to see that everyone was in absolute repose.

Dr. Muck a Brahms Enthusiast.

No comment is necessary as to Paderewski's art. It remains unapproachable and unquestioned as to its finish and as to everything embraced in that word. The concert, on the whole, was one of the most delightful ever given by the Boston Symphony in this city. The symphony was Brahms' E Minor, No. 4. That Dr. Muck is partial to Brahms is shown in his selection of two symphonies by that composer for his five concerts here this year.

Brahms has not come to be fully understood and appreciated by the large body of music-lovers, and the Fourth is exclusively for the Brahmsites, who applaud whether it be of gold, silver, copper or brass that is being presented. This symphony is full of silvery bars of melody, especially the second movement, but the brass does not enter until the finale.

Dr. Muck gave a spirited reading of the great work and the audience applauded vigorously and repeatedly called him back, when he finally directed the orchestra to stand and share with him in the enthusiasm. The always appreciated tone poem by Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung," was the other number, which was played with excellent taste.

[138]

AMERICAN, MARCH 14, 1914.

Paderewski Wins Symphony Applause

Jan Paderewski, whose press agent or somebody acting as such has been reporting from various parts of the country as about to break down from nervous prostration as a result of black hand threats, appeared with the Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

He appeared in his usual robust health and the only approach to a breakdown came from the piano, which he pounded in his good old-fashioned way. Paderewski played his own concerto, a work which is brilliant and beautiful in many places and full of the most surprising technical requirements.

As usual, he was wildly applauded. The concerto was admirably played both by the soloist and orchestra. Chadwick's attractive Symphony was upon the bill yesterday for the first time in a long time. This work is now nearly twenty years old. Its themes are pleasant and its construction scholarly.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,

MARCH 14, 1914.

PADEREWSKI HAS A UNIQUE TRIUMPH

People Wait All Day to Hear Him in Concert and Impromptu Recital.

By E. F. Harkins.

All rules and records fall before Paderewski. Enthusiasts gathered as early as 8 o'clock yesterday morning outside Symphony Hall to see the most brilliant star of the musical world make his first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra since February, 1909, and they remained in the hall until 5.15, nine and a quarter hours later, to plead with applause for another encore.

When the "All Seats Sold" sign was hung up early in the afternoon, the line of hopeful hero-worshipers extended from the Massachusetts avenue entrance around to Huntington avenue and up almost to Gainsboro street. The house could have been sold half over again. And after the Symphony concert, in which the pianistic superman took the solo part in the performance of his own beautiful concerto in A minor, the ironclad no-encore rule was suspended for the first time since Paderewski was here before, and for nearly three-quarters of an hour the master pianist of the times gave an impromptu recital.

A tone pastel by Couperin, given with infinite grace, was the first extra, and then came pieces by Schumann and others. It was all worth waiting for—even in the case of those who hurried to the hall after breakfast and took their lunches with them to consume unabashed upon the steps.

And now Paderewski is himself again. The three weeks' rest in the golden West have cured him of his nervousness and restored his good humor. Yesterday he played in his old-time form, with scarcely any detonations, such as marred his tone at the recital he gave here last fall, and with that perfection of technique and melting loveliness of tone that sustain his supremacy among the pianists of the day and give music-lovers pleasure beyond compare.

The concert yesterday would have been memorable if nothing had been played except the concerto, for the composition is so designed that the orchestra has as important a part as the soloist, and the men under Dr. Muck performed their share con amore and with an artistry fairly rivaling that of the composer-pianist himself.

Paderewski has often said that the Boston orchestra is the finest in the world, and yesterday he seemed to be reflecting upon this very compliment as he listened to the exquisite performance of the various solo passages in the charming romanza forming the second movement of the concerto.

America was strongly represented in the program. The third symphony of George W. Chadwick of Boston was revived, and a new tone poem, "Samson," by Rubin Goldmark of New York, was given its first performance.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MARCH 14.

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST AT 18TH REHEARSAL

Plays Finale of His A Minor Concerto Dramatically.

Rubin Goldmark's "Samson" for the First Time Anywhere.

The 18th Symphony rehearsal occurred yesterday afternoon. Mr Paderewski was the soloist. Dr Muck conducted. The program was as follows:

Chadwick..............3d Symphony, F major
Rubin Goldmark............Tone Poem Samson
First performance.
Paderewski..........A minor concerto, op 17

Mr Paderewski kept the audience waiting—Dr Muck included—for his usual impressive entrance. With a conductor of less distinction on the stand it necessarily would have been less impressive. Mr Paderewski also gave an exceedingly dramatic performance in the last movement of his concerto, music in which the piano is made an orchestral instrument with others, a performance in which conductor was quite as much the virtuoso as the soloist.

In the song of the slow movement and in the cadenza, Mr Paderewski also forced a hard and wiry tone and was guilty of slovenly and ragged attack, which in Miss Mary Jones, an obscure young debutante recitalist, would have been roundly roasted the next morning. It was a pleasure to hear music by Mr Chadwick in which there is scholarship and virility without the loss of dignity. The promulgation of any score which invites the upright and self-righteous to a consideration of Delilah, stimulating and amiable woman in and out of opera houses, is to be encouraged.

Mr Goldmark has written amiable music. Although he has chosen a storied theme, and has four subtitles—the tone poem is played without pause—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," "The Temple"—he is to be thanked for not insisting upon an arbitrary program. We are not compelled, for example, to note the exact moment when Samson is sheared, nor are we enlightened as to what then happens, a point which neither the performances at the Boston Opera House nor the pages of Holy Writ have made plain.

The composer has chosen musical motives to be representatives of his protagonists. That which is to lift the veil from Delilah's face first is heard in the English horn and solo viola, two instruments successful in inducing thoughts of the Orient. The clarinet later discources of her. The material symbolical of Sampson is less characteristic. There is little to suggest the mighty warrior of Israel, a man of great devotion to his cause, who should not be judged too harshly for certain moral lapses. There was no clear differentiation between the two characters, who invite well-defined characterization.

Mr Goldmark is no novice with an orchestra. He knows how to group instruments and set off a single voice or a choir. He has contrapuntal facility, and is not without invention or skill in development. His harmonic scheme is colorful without being bizarre or acrid. He knows the saving power to the ear of a long melodic line, and of incisive accentuation. His work is well scored and the product of thoughtful and skilled effort, but not of inevitable or commanding inspiration.

Mr Paderewski was permitted to play encores, a special dispensation at these concerts made only to a few of the immortals. He continued them until what was said to be a late hour. The first of these—which might have been variations upon an air by an early French or Italian classicist—was welcome, for here Mr Paderewski demanded of the piano those things which it can give, and played with continence and beauty of style. While the last movement has a sweeping and barbaric fury his concerto is not to be taken too seriously as music. Mr Paderewski showed that he still can be volcanic as a technician. The chief pleasure in the preformance was the euphony of the orchestra and the purity of style for example of Mr Longy's playing. Fortunately there are instruments that must be kept within the dynamic frame for which they were intended.

ADVERTISER.

MARCH 14

PADEREWSKI WITH THE SYMPHONY

POLISH PIANIST WINS HIS USUAL TRIUMPH

Chadwick's Third Symphony Chief Orchestral Work This Week—Goldmark's "Samson."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Chadwick...............Third Symphony, F major
Rubin Goldmark............"Samson." Tone-poem
Paderewski..............Piano Concerto, A minor
Pianist, Mr. Paderewski.

The matter can be told in a nutshell,—Paderewski, the pianist,—!!!! Paderewski, the composer,—???? It is given to very few to be, like Liszt, great as pianist and as composer. Even Rubinstein stood higher as an artist than as a creator in Music. Paderewski's works are chiefly successful when Paderewski himself plays or directs them. His symphony, his opera "Manru," his concerto, his sonata (but not his little Minuet), rely upon personal prestige in a large degree, but that prestige is so overwhelming that it would float far less worthy works.

For there is skill, talent, and learning in all of Paderewski's works in the large forms, but scarcely a fine frenzy of inspiration. But it was quite enough for the general public that Paderewski was to play, had he played scales and Schmitt's Five-finger exercises the result would have been the same, and the waiting crowd of rush-seaters began to gather in the early morning, while before the doors were opened the line extended far into the adjacent streets.

Let us add at once that his piano-playing is worth all the excitement it creates. No man alive has such boundless versatility, such a keen perception of different emotions in music and such a faculty of portraying them. There need be no question as regards the right to the title of "greatest living pianist."

There had been rumors of illness, of nervous prostration, of abandonment of the American tour, but there were no evidences of this in yesterday afternoon's work. We have sometimes found fault with his freedom of interpretation in certain of the classics and considered him an unsafe guide to the piano student; but on this occasion he was ruler in his own kingdom, the work was his own and he had a right to lay down the law as to the points of its interpretation. He made sharp contrasts, but the outline was clear, the form was intelligible. He gave tremendous force at times, but we are past the epoch when this may be denied to the modern pianist at a modern piano.

In short Paderewski was at his very best, and although he began after the audience had had one hour and a half of very earnest music, he aroused them at once to something like frenzied enthusiasm.

Nor is the concerto that he composed and played to be slighted altogether. Its first movement is very effective and the piano is welded into the orchestral score in a most commendable manner. Dr. Muck and his men evidently caught the enthusiasm that was in the air, and supported the pianist nobly.

The work falls off in interest in the last two movements, but the wonderful playing of Paderewski in the finale was bound to have its result, and at the end of the programme no one seemed to make an exit, even the musicians remained in their seats. Everybody seemed to know what it meant to place Paderewski at the end of a symphonic programme, and the demand for "more" became irresistible. Therefore we left the great pianist giving a series of delightful encores. With these, at a symphony concert, we have nought to do.

Musically considered, Mr. Chadwick's symphony was the best part of the programme, even if we somewhat prefer the second symphony to the third. We consider Mr. Chadwick the first among American composers, for he has an amount of contrapuntal skill that is equal to that of any American, yet he never allows this skill to rule him, to lead him into pedantry. His geniality is always marked; he is spontaneous even in the most exacting forms. Luther once said of Des Pres: "Others are ruled by the notes; only Des Pres rules the notes." Somewhat in this manner has Mr. Chadwick digested the rules of composition.

Note that this symphony was concise, a very rare virtue in a modern work. It is written for "classical orchestra" (plus trombones and tuba), not one unusual instrument appearing. That the composer was not forced to this conservatism the great score of his "Aphrodite" may show. Note also that the symphonic shape is not mangled, it is "regelrecht" and can be measured by the classical yard-stick, yet it expresses modern thoughts. The freedom of rhythmic treatment in the first movement shows this at the very beginning.

Yet we find the third symphony less inspired and inspiring than the great overtures or the "Aphrodite" of this composer. One admired the surety of the development of themes, the contrapuntal touches of the finale, and the Scherzo with its beautiful trio won even popular success; but as a whole the symphony is less spontaneous than other of Mr. Chadwick's works and too subtle in treatment for general popularity. Yet Dr. Muck was twice recalled at its close.

In speaking of Mr. Chadwick's symphony it may not be amiss to speak a word of tribute to a publisher who is quietly doing very much to advance the cause of American music. This symphony, the second symphony, the tone-poem "Aphrodite," and other American orchestral scores have been printed by Arthur P. Schmidt, an undertaking that involves considerable self-sacrifice in a country so young in orchestral matters as America.

---

tsburg, Pa.

1884

SERIES.

al of the artists
d series of Ellis
e coming season is evidenced in enewals received the series re-
The list of at-
e. Olive Fremstad;
one of the Metro-er singer; Harold Kreisler, violinist, with the Boston

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 15 1914

E 1884

Coming Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America 20-odd years ago, but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 1888 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvellous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90s, and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete programme. The symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful scherzo, which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire programme early in the

---

K

From PRESS

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 12 1914

Est 1884

PADEREWSKI GIVEN UNUSUAL OVATION

Boston Symphony Presents Fine Program at Fifth and Last Concert.

PROGRAM

Brahms,
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Strauss,
Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguratoin"), Op. 24
Padereweski,
Concerto in A minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Conductor........Dr. Carl Muck
Soloist..........................Paderewski

Paderewski again demonstrated how unselfish he is with his art at the Academy of Music last evening, where he was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His number being the last on the program, it gave the audience the opportunity for a display of enthusiasm as is only called out when Paderewski plays. He showed his willingness to distribute as much favor as he received, by playing two encores. He indulged his audience as freely as the aspiring artist, and broke the cast-iron Boston Symphony rule of no encores, which seems to imply but when Paderewski plays.

Two Encores Played.

After the long concerto in A minor of Paderewski's own composition, the vast audience remained seated and called him out a number of times, and when they noticed his move to the piano the applause was accompanied with cheers. His first encore was Rubenstein's beautiful "Barcarole." Applause and cheers followed and he was again called out repeatedly, and when for the second time he approached the piano, fully three-fourths of the audience were still in their seats and he played Liszt's familiar "Second Rhapsodie." Each selection he preceded with a number of chords until there was perfect quiet in the meantime glancing about to see that everyone was in absolute repose.

Dr. Muck a Brahms Enthusiast.

No comment is necessary as to Paderewski's art. It remains unapproachable and unquestioned as to its finish and as to everything embraced in that word. The concert, on the whole, was one of the most delightful ever given by the Boston Symphony in this city. The symphony was Brahms' E Minor, No. 4. That Dr. Muck is partial to Brahms is shown in his selection of two symphonies by that composer for his five concerts here this year.

Brahms has not come to be fully understood and appreciated by the large body of music-lovers, and the Fourth is exclusively for the Brahmsites, who applaud whether it be of gold, silver, copper or brass that is being presented. This symphony is full of silvery bars of melody, especially the second movement, but the brass does not enter until the finale.

Dr. Muck gave a spirited reading of the great work and the audience applauded vigorously and repeatedly called him back, when he finally directed the orchestra to stand and share with him in the enthusiasm. The always appreciated tone poem by Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung," was the other number, which was played with excellent taste.

[138]

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 15 1914
Esta 1884

Might Heed Public.

Let these good people show now what strength they have; let them rise in a mass and support the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House in persuading Arturo Toscanini to continue his activities in America. For all we know, to be sure, their efforts will produce no results. Yet a public demand may obtain what the eloquence of Otto H. Kahn and his associates and the financial resources at their disposal are unable to accomplish. It is not a question of money, though $200,000 for three [illegible] seasons in Buenos Ayres, which would leave the winters open for conducting symphony concerts in Europe, represents an offer that Toscanini surely cannot afford to ignore. The true reason for his decision to abandon the Metropolitan Opera House as soon as his present contract has expired is the feeling that he has come to a standstill in New York; that he is not finding here a complete outlet for his energies, a free sweep for his ambitions.

No doubt the idea of conducting symphonic concerts is exerting a great attraction on Toscanini at present. The people of Berlin, Munich, Vienna and other musical centres of Europe are anxious to make his acquaintance. He is flooded with invitations from various musical organizations abroad. Indeed, it almost seems as if there were more of a demand for his services on the other side of the Atlantic, though not perhaps in terms financial, than in the United States. Certainly it is significant that neither the Boston Symphony Orchestra nor the Philharmonic Society of New York, which lately bound itself to another term of years under the direction of Josef Stransky, took the pains to inquire whether Arturo Toscanini would be willing to consider any proposals.

Bureau in the World

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914
York, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Paderewski as Assisting Artist at the Academy of Music

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, and no wonder. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was giving its last local concert for the present season, is generally able to attract a capacity audience upon its own merits, and as it had Paderewski for its assisting artist upon this occasion the result, notwithstanding the advance in prices, can be imagined. Not a vacant seat was visible in any part of the auditorium and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. Interest naturally centred in Paderewski, of whose disagreeable experiences in the Far West something has been reported. His face showed some signs of the unpleasant ordeal through which he was made to pass, but not a trace of it could be recognized in his playing.

That was as eloquent and brilliant and masterly as ever and the storm of applause which it elicited bespoke the admiration of a most intelligently appreciative audience. Paderewski played his own concerto in A minor, Op. 17, and while there are other things any one of which most of those present would probably have preferred, there is much of value and of beauty in this poetic and skillfully constructed composition. It has not been heard here for many years, so that it possessed the attraction of a quasi-novelty and it was wonderfully well interpreted, with a captivating touch and a sympathetic sentiment and with that extraordinary combination of delicacy with strength which is the most noteworthy and appealing characteristic feature of Paderewski's art.

There were only two orchestral numbers, the E minor symphony of Brahms' and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Brahms' E minor symphony is not generally the best-liked of the four, which is presumably the reason why it is the least frequently given; but it would be better liked if it were oftener heard, for it is music of the kind that grows upon the listener and that does not communicate its full message or disclose all its beauty on a first hearing. It is also music that needs to be very clearly and intelligently interpreted, with a careful regard for the exhibition of its detail and an acute capacity for the symmetrical disclosure of its structural propositions: and this is the sort of interpretation, "lucid, luminous and exquisitely balanced, which it received last night.

Quite a different kind of treatment is requred for an adequate and satisfying performance of "Tod und Verklarung." This is a score where the colors have been laid on with a liberal brush and where the aim has been at striking contrasts and broad effects, and Dr. Muck modified his methods to meet the occasion. He led the orchestra with a fine free sweep and conducted it to a culminating and final climax of tremendous impressiveness and grandeur.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 1914
k, 1884

The fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky will be played at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 24. This work, famous particularly for its marvelous scherzo, which the strings play pizzicati throughout, was the great favorite of the composer, and while it has been longer making its way in the favor of the public than the "Pathetique," or even the "Fifth," to-day musicians believe that it shows to the largest degree of any of the symphonies the finest qualities of Tschaikowsky's genius. It is thoroughly Russian.

At this concert the soloist will be Paderewski, and it will be his only appearance in this city, and the last of a series of concerts in which he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last evening and on Friday afternoon he played with the orchestra in Boston, and the coming week he is to be the soloist at all of its concerts on its regular Southern trip in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, twice in New York and in Brooklyn.

Despite the illness which compelled the pianist to cancel several concerts last October, and also to cancel a number of his concerts on the Pacific coast in February, it seems to be the general opinion that he has never played better than this year. On Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has ever held, and according to the criticisms the following morning his old-time charm was as potent as ever.

Here he will play his own Concerto in A-minor, written in 1888, when he was studying in Vienna with Leschetitsky, and played many times during his early tours of the United States.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 14
k, 1884

For the first time anywhere, a symphony by Mr. Urack, who has conducted several of the Boston Symphony concerts here, was produced at the concert in Boston a week ago, thereby provoking considerable criticism, favorable and otherwise, as was natural in an audience of that size.

For many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been accounted one of the few institutions to which merit was the only entry and this season for the first time there have been heard malicious rumors of the increasing play of "pull" in the ordering of the concerts which loyal supporters of the organization have been quick to resent. Envious composers and their friends were quick to attribute Mr. Urack's distinction to this same "pull," although critics gave Mr. Urack's symphony a fair meed of praise, pointing out that the audience unmistakably liked the symphony for the very qualities in which the learned and exacting found cause for reproach.

An analysis of the symphony showed that his melodies were frankly obvious and songful, and as one critic put it—"sometimes they were tunes naked and unashamed." His music was shown to disclose clear resource with harmonic and instrumental means, a quick keen sense of instrumental timbres, used with imagination, but lacking variety of method. His invention, imagination and emotion were not considered to have quite risen to the fine heights of his purpose; but in the very simplicity of his work, not attempting to show how different he could be from others, but writing orchestral song for its own sake, much promise is discerned.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914
Established: Lon

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paderewski Receives Ovation at Orchestra's Last Concert.

The last concert to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought an audience to the Academy of Music last night that taxed the seating capacity of the house. The closing concert of this orchestra is always an occasion of regret. The months that must intervene before such a superb organization can be heard again have a way of projecting themselves into the mind no matter how much the music is being enjoyed.

Last night's concert was made doubly important by the presence of Ignace Paderewski, as soloist, playing his own concerto in A Minor. The orchestral offerings were the Brahm's Symphony in E Minor No. 4, and Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung." This symphony is one of Brahm's most beautiful orchestral works, and could easily become as popular as those more frequently heard. Dr. Muck's reading of Brahms is always a delight. The clarity of his rhythmic presentation, the lovely singing tone he draws in legato passages, and his keen dramatic insight into the stronger and more vital aspects of the work are factors that render his interpretations of the highest value.

The Strauss tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," so wonderful in parts and so unspeababl y opposed to all reason, was a performance that revealed all its beauty, as well as all its ugliness. A great deal of enthusiasm was shown for this work.

There was a prolonged ovation for Paderewski. His concerto proved delightful, full of technical brilliancy and infectious rhythms in the first and last movements, and ity of tone that it fairly stunned the audience. At its conclusion there was a tremendous ovation for the pianist. But no one had any intention of leaving until more of his wonderful art had been heard. Finally, after about a dozen appearances to respond to applause, Paderewski consented to play. His first selection was a Rubinstein Barcarolle, to which he gave all the intimate charm demanded by that type of music. At the close of this a second outburst of cheers and applause induced Paderewski to play again. His second encore was a very much embellished version of Liszt's "Sixth Rhapsody."

---

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 15 1914
Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concert for the last time this season at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Paderewski, probably the greatest pianist in the world, who also makes his farewell appearance of the season in Washington. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

The following program will be given: Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony; the Siegfried "Idyl," Wagner, and Paul Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Paderewski will play his own Concerto in A minor, opus 17, a work of great melodic charm, which he wrote in 1888.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 17 1914
Established: L

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND PADEREWSKI

Virtuoso Heard in His Own Concerto in A Minor for Piano and Orchestra — Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

PROGRAM.

1. Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4.
2. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklaerung."
3. Paderewski—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra.

The fifth and last concert of its 29th Philadelphia season was given by the Boston Symphony last night at the Academy of Music to an audience that filled the edifice and bore witness in no uncertain fashion to its pleasure in the performance. The unusual order of the program brought the symphony first, and the soloist, Mr. Paderewski, last, suggesting an artful—and in this case most welcome—scheme to give the great Polish virtuoso a chance to play again without breaking the inviolable rule against encores during the program. Of course, for what may happen at an "overflow meeting" the management is not responsible!

The Brahms Symphony was given a mettlesome reading, of sharp contrasts in light and shade and forceful dynamics; the trumpets granted a strongly assertive license in the first movement and (with the other brasses) in the last. The clarinet came exquisitely to the fore in the andante, and was followed by the strings in well-balanced symmetry, emitting a broad choral diapason of pure and luscious tone. The spirited allegro gave place to a finale in which the oboe and flute were manipulated with surpassing skill; and after recalls of Doctor Muck the players were bidden to rise in a body by way of recognition of the plaudits bestowed.

The "Tod und Verklaerung" is played "con amore" by a modern orchestra, for it gives an abundance of chances to display individual virtuosity. Doctor Muck made the most of its towering climaxes with the challenging proclamation of the brasses at their summit. The harp was superbly played; Anto Witek's violin and the flute rose to their opportunities. It was an intensely dramatic and virile reading.

Paderewski was magnificent. The auditorium—a blessed relief—was entirely darkened for his contribution to the program, which, with the encores and the intervals of waiting for the latter, occupied an hour, the concerto itself taking 30 minutes to perform.

The leonine strength and fury of impassioned fortissimo passages were offset by an exquisite caressing tenderness in gentler moods and tenses; the brilliant candenza of the first movement, the corruscating runs at an electrifying rate, the rhythm that always kept at one with the remarkably adroit accompaniment, the elan and fire and transcendent rapture that enlivened the entire work were such as none but Paderewski at his best could reach. The kettle drum, leading to hammer-strokes at the keyboard, the muted horns and flute preluding the piano in the slow movement, the gipsy fever-in-the-blood of the finale bespoke supreme skill in the musical architecture to parallel that of the playing.

The audience, standing in their places to applaud with might and main, would not leave till the Barcarolle in F of Rubinstein and (after a long interval) the Second Rhapsody of Liszt were additional concessions, after anxious moments, when it was feared that entering shafts of light from the swinging doors would disturb the magnanimous pianist to the point of refusal. An audience is not often granted so generous a measure at a single concert.

[139]

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
MAR 15 1914
Date
Esta 1884

Might Heed Public.

Let these good people show now what strength they have; let them rise in a mass and support the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House in persuading Arturo Toscanini to continue his activities in America. For all we know, to be sure, their efforts will produce no results. Yet a public demand may obtain what the eloquence of Otto H. Kahn and his associates and the financial resources at their disposal are unable to accomplish. It is not a question of money, though $200,000 for three [illegible] seasons in Buenos Ayres, which would leave the winters open for conducting symphony concerts in Europe, represents an offer that Toscanini surely cannot afford to ignore. The true reason for his decision to abandon the Metropolitan Opera House as soon as his present contract has expired is the feeling that he has come to a standstill in New York; that he is not finding here a complete outlet for his energies, a free sweep for his ambitions.

No doubt the idea of conducting symphonic concerts is exerting a great attraction on Toscanini at present. The people of Berlin, Munich, Vienna and other musical centres of Europe are anxious to make his acquaintance. He is flooded with invitations from various musical organizations abroad. Indeed, it almost seems as if there were more of a demand for his services on the other side of the Atlantic, though not perhaps in terms financial, than in the United States. Certainly it is significant that neither the Boston Symphony Orchestra nor the Philharmonic Society of New York, which lately bound itself to another term of years under the direction of Josef Stransky, took the pains to inquire whether Arturo Toscanini would be willing to consider any proposals.

Bureau in the World
From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914
ork, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

With Paderewski as Assisting Artist at the Academy of Music

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, and no wonder. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was giving its last local concert for the present season, is generally able to attract a capacity audience upon its own merits, and as it had Paderewski for its assisting artist upon this occasion the result, notwithstanding the advance in prices, can be imagined. Not a vacant seat was visible in any part of the auditorium and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. Interest naturally centred in Paderewski, of whose disagreeable experiences in the Far West something has been reported. His face showed some signs of the unpleasant ordeal through which he was made to pass, but not a trace of it could be recognized in his playing.

That was as eloquent and brilliant and masterly as ever and the storm of applause which it elicited bespoke the admiration of a most intelligently appreciative audience. Paderewski played his own concerto in A minor, Op. 17, and while there are other things any one of which most of those present would probably have preferred, there is much of value and of beauty in this poetic and skillfully constructed composition. It has not been heard here for many years, so that it possessed the attraction of a quasi-novelty and it was wonderfully well interpreted, with a captivating touch and a sympathetic sentiment and with that extraordinary combination of delicacy with strength which is the most noteworthy and appealing characteristic feature of Paderewski's art.

There were only two orchestral numbers, the E minor symphony of Brahms' and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Brahms' E minor symphony is not generally the best-liked of the four, which is presumably the reason why it is the least frequently given; but it would be better liked if it were oftener heard, for it is music of the kind that grows upon the listener and that does not communicate its full message or disclose all its beauty on a first hearing. It is also music that needs to be very clearly and intelligently interpreted, with a careful regard for the exhibition of its detail and an acute capacity for the symmetrical disclosure of its structural propositions; and this is the sort of interpretation, lucid, luminous and exquisitely balanced, which it received last night.

Quite a different kind of treatment is requred for an adequate and satisfying performance of "Tod und Verklarung." This is a score where the colors have been laid on with a liberal brush and where the aim has been at striking contrasts and broad effects, and Dr. Muck modified his methods to meet the occasion. He led the orchestra with a fine free sweep and conducted it to a culminating and final climax of tremendous impressiveness and grandeur.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 1914
k, 1884

The fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky will be played at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 24. This work, famous particularly for its marvelous scherzo, which the strings play pizzicati throughout, was the great favorite of the composer, and while it has been longer making its way in the favor of the public than the "Pathetique," or even the "Fifth," to-day musicians believe that it shows to the largest degree of any of the symphonies the finest qualities of Tschaikowsky's genius. It is thoroughly Russian.

At this concert the soloist will be Paderewski, and it will be his only appearance in this city, and the last of a series of concerts in which he has played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last evening and on Friday afternoon he played with the orchestra in Boston, and the coming week he is to be the soloist at all of its concerts on its regular Southern trip in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, twice in New York and in Brooklyn.

Despite the illness which compelled the pianist to cancel several concerts last October, and also to cancel a number of his concerts on the Pacific coast in February, it seems to be the general opinion that he has never played better than this year. On Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has ever held, and according to the criticisms the following morning his old-time charm was as potent as ever.

Here he will play his own Concerto in A-minor, written in 1888, when he was studying in Vienna with Leschetitsky, and played many times during his early tours of the United States.

* * *

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date 1914
k, 1884

For the first time anywhere, a symphony by Mr. Urack, who has conducted several of the Boston Symphony concerts here, was produced at the concert in Boston a week ago, thereby provoking considerable criticism, favorable and otherwise, as was natural in an audience of that size.

For many years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been accounted one of the few institutions to which merit was the only entry and this season for the first time there have been heard malicious rumors of the increasing play of "pull" in the ordering of the concerts which loyal supporters of the organization have been quick to resent. Envious composers and their friends were quick to attribute Mr. Urack's distinction to this same "pull," although critics gave Mr. Urack's symphony a fair meed of praise, pointing out that the audience unmistakably liked the symphony for the very qualities in which the learned and exacting found cause for reproach.

An analysis of the symphony showed that his melodies were frankly obvious and songful, and as one critic put it—"sometimes they were tunes naked and unashamed." His music was shown to disclose clear resource with harmonic and instrumental means, a quick keen sense of instrumental timbres, used with imagination, but lacking variety of method. His invention, imagination and emotion were not considered to have quite risen to the fine heights of his purpose; but in the very simplicity of his work, not attempting to show how different he could be from others, but writing orchestral song for its own sake, much promise is discerned.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914
Established: Lon

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paderewski Receives Ovation at Orchestra's Last Concert.

The last concert to be given this season in Philadelphia by the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought an audience to the Academy of Music last night that taxed the seating capacity of the house. The closing concert of this orchestra is always an occasion of regret. The months that must intervene before such a superb organization can be heard again have a way of projecting themselves into the mind no matter how much the music is being enjoyed.

Last night's concert was made doubly important by the presence of Ignace Paderewski, as soloist, playing his own concerto in A Minor. The orchestral offerings were the Brahm's Symphony in E Minor No. 4, and Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung." This symphony is one of Brahm's most beautiful orchestral works, and could easily become as popular as those more frequently heard. Dr. Muck's reading of Brahms is always a delight. The clarity of his rhythmic presentation, the lovely singing tone he draws in legato passages, and his keen dramatic insight into the stronger and more vital aspects of the work are factors that render his interpretations of the highest value.

The Strauss tone poem, "Tod und Verklaerung," so wonderful in parts and so unspeababły opposed to all reason, was a performance that revealed all its beauty, as well as all its ugliness. A great deal of enthusiasm was shown for this work.

There was a prolonged ovation for Paderewski. His concerto proved delightful, full of technical brilliancy and infectious rhythms in the first and last movements, and [illegible] by a ity of tone that it fairly stunned the udience. At its conclusion there was a tremendous ovation for the pianist. But no one had any intention of leaving until more of his wonderful art had been heard. Finally, after about a dozen appearances to respond to applause, Paderewski consented to play. His first selection was a Rubinstein Barcarolle, to which he gave all the intimate charm demanded by that type of music. At the close of this a second outburst of cheers nd applause induced Paderewski to play gain. His second encore was a very uch embellished version of Liszt's "Sixth hapsody."

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1914
Es 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in concert for the last time this season at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Paderewski, probably the greatest pianist in the world, who also makes his farewell appearance of the season in Washington. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

The following program will be given: Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony; the Siegfried "Idyl," Wagner, and Paul Dukas' Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Paderewski will play his own Concerto in A minor, opus 17, a work of great melodic charm, which he wrote in 1888.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 17 1914
Established:
1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND PADEREWSKI

Virtuoso Heard in His Own Concerto in A Minor for Piano and Orchestra — Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

PROGRAM.

1. Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4.
2. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklaerung."
3. Paderewski—Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra.

The fifth and last concert of its 29th Philadelphia season was given by the Boston Symphony last night at the Academy of Music to an audience that filled the edifice and bore witness in no uncertain fashion to its pleasure in the performance. The unusual order of the program brought the symphony first, and the soloist, Mr. Paderewski, last, suggesting an artful—and in this case most welcome—scheme to give the great Polish virtuoso a chance to play again without breaking the inviolable rule against encores during the program. Of course, for what may happen at an "overflow meeting" the management is not responsible!

The Brahms Symphony was given a mettlesome reading, of sharp contrasts in light and shade and forceful dynamics; the trumpets granted a strongly assertive license in the first movement and (with the other brasses) in the last. The clarinet came exquisitely to the fore in the andante, and was followed by the strings in well-balanced symmetry, emitting a broad choral diapason of pure and luscious tone. The spirited allegro gave place to a finale in which the oboe and flute were manipulated with surpassing skill; and after recalls of Doctor Muck the players were bidden to rise in a body by way of recognition of the plaudits bestowed.

The "Tod und Verklaerung" is played "con amore" by a modern orchestra, for it gives an abundance of chances to display individual virtuosity. Doctor Muck made the most of its towering climaxes with the challenging proclamation of the brasses at their summit. The harp was superbly played; Anto Witek's violin and the flute rose to their opportunities. It was an intensely dramatic and virile reading.

Paderewski was magnificent. The auditorium—a blessed relief—was entirely darkened for his contribution to the program, which, with the encores and the intervals of waiting for the latter, occupied an hour, the concerto itself taking 30 minutes to perform.

The leonine strength and fury of impassioned fortissimo passages were offset by an exquisite caressing tenderness in gentler moods and tenses; the brilliant candenza of the first movement, the corruscating runs at an electrifying rate, the rhythm that always kept at one with the remarkably adroit accompaniment, the elan and fire and transcendent rapture that enlivened the entire work were such as none but Paderewski at his best could reach. The kettle drum, leading to hammer-strokes at the keyboard, the muted horns and flute preluding the piano in the slow movement, the gipsy fever-in-the-blood of the finale bespoke supreme skill in the musical architecture to parallel that of the playing.

The audience, standing in their places to applaud with might and main, would not leave till the Barcarolle in F of Rubinstein and (after a long interval) the Second Rhapsody of Liszt were additional concessions, after anxious moments, when it was feared that entering shafts of light from the swinging doors would disturb the magnanimous pianist to the point of refusal. An audience is not often granted so generous a measure at a single concert.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914

1884

PADEREWSKI HERE IN YEAR'S LAST CONCERT

Peer of Pianists Appears With Boston Symphony Orchestra Before Big Audience

CHEERED BY THE THRONG

PADEREWSKI, peer of pianists, living or dead, made wondrous music at the Boston Orchestra's final concert of the season here last evening, and the enthusiastic throng that packed the Academy of Music rose at him in old-time fervency, just as when he first startled all ears in the roaring '80s.

It was then, in the first maturity of his genius, that the virtuoso wrote the A minor concerto for piano and orchestra which was the concluding number of Doctor Muck's concert. A more impressive and artistically gratifying close of a local orchestral season could scarcely be desired or imagined.

The A minor concerto is almost an ideal composition for public exhibition of virtuoso quality. Both main themes and structural development are largely confided to the orchestral body, while the solo instrument ornaments, decorates and almost envelops the vast tonal scheme with amazing complexity and ethereal, supernal beauty of sweet sound. It is the Lisztian way, as contradistinguished from Gallic affectations that reverse this instrumental true relation.

Although the years have set their signs upon the pianist's personality, his technical skill is as astonishing as ever, his genius still free from shadow of faltering or hint of acerbity. There is still in evidence the pristine Paderewski generosity—the audience remained to applaud instead of dispersing, and were rewarded by an encore number, the artist's minuet in A minor. The no-encore rule of the Boston organization is non-existent for Paderewski. Mention here, by the way, is due to the piano—one of the finest instruments for solo work ever heard on the Academy stage.

The orchestral force, too, contributed in no slight degree to one of the most artistically perfect and most psychically effective performances of this or any other musical season.

For all thunder in the index there was Brahm's labored, highly musicological fourth symphony, of which the third movement a joyous allegro, is a gem that, "like a star in darkest night, sticks fiery off indeed." The rest seems much like some wise man vainly striving to remember lost strains of old native melody with all the choirs engaged in the task.

Afterward there were blows of Straussian sound—Richard, not Johann—in "Death and Transfiguration," superbly and speedily healed, however, by Paderewski's distinguished art.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From News
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 7 - 1914

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 24. The interest of the concert will centre aturally in the soloist, who will be aderewski. This will be his only apearance in Providence this year, and it ill be the last opportunity to hear m in several years. Paderewski has lly recovered from the indisposition hich compelled him to cancel a number of his concerts on the Pacifi ccoast, and rom all accounts he is playing again th all his old-time brilliancy. At the co ert here he will probably play his Co certo in A Minor, which has not heard here in many years.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 15 1914
Date

1884

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Paderewski. He will play his own concerto in A minor, opus 17, which he wrote in 1888. The program comprises in addition to the concerto, Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony", Wagner's "Siegfried idyl, and Paul Dukas' scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The concerto is last on the program.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 15 1914

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The solist will be Paderewski, whose last appearance it will be in Washington. He will play his own concerto in A minor, Opus 17, a work of great melodic charm, which he wrote in 1888. The program comprises in addition to the concerto, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried" idyl, and Paul Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The concerto is last on the program. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa. FEB 22 1914
Date

1884

For Next Season.

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music Hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close by the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Subscribers of the present season are entitled to the same seats by giving notice on or before April 1 to Miss May Beegle, representing the Ellis concerts, 1312 Farmers Bank building. Those desiring to make a change in their location will be given first consideration after April 1 in advance of new subscribers, whose orders are also now being received and filed in order of receipt.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 22 1914

k, 1884

PADEREWSKI GIVES AN EXTRA RECITAL

Pianist Defies Conventional Rules at Close of Boston Symphony Concert.

HEARD BY THRONG IN CARNEGIE HALL

Programme so Arranged That Innovation Comes in Least Objectionable Manner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall did not end with Dr. Karl Muck and his musicians bowing a farewell to their multitudinous subscribers, but with Ignace Jan Paderewski, soloist of the matinee, giving a supplementary piano recital, half an hour in duration, before a throng of his most enthusiastic admirers.

Encores from soloists at symphony concerts are not usually considered quite the proper thing. But the programme, which opened with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4, and included the Andante, Minuet and Rondo of Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade, had been so arranged as to permit the famous pianist to break conventional rules in the least objectionable manner. As Beethoven's Concerto in E flat major, No. 5, came last on the list, the orchestra, Dr. Muck and all these listeners whose appetite had been satisfied with two hours of music had the privilege of leaving before Paderewski indulged his devotees with a group of solo pieces comprising Liszt's transcription of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," one of Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words and several Chopin numbers.

Pianist at His Best.

In the Beethoven concerto, with the orchestra under Dr. Muck giving excellent support, Paderewski was at his best. A more impressive interpretation of this masterpiece—impressive for its dramatic sweep as well as for its finely elaborated details of dynamic shading and nuance—has not been heard in recent years. A pity under the circumstances that piano and orchestra should not have been attuned exactly to the same pitch. The difference of intonation, slight as it was, proved extremely disconcerting for sensitive ears.

After four or five recalls the lights were turned down, not as an intimation that it was time to go home, but as a suggestion that Paderewski would give soulful expression to his feelings in the semi-obscurity which his interpretative spirit craves.

Without the limitations imposed upon his poetic fancy by orchestra and conductor he was not heard to as great advantage, however. In the "Liebestod," for example, he made the same errors that had been noted in his performance of that selection at every previous hear-

---

That Dr. Muck is not an admirer of Tschaikowsky is known well. Under the circumstances one did not look forward to an inspired reading of the fourth symphony. The scherzo, however, could hardly have been played more effectively.

Concert Master Witek performed the solo violin part of the Mozart Serenade, but not with wholly happy results.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 22 1914

Establishe

PIANO STARS FEATURES OF THE WEEK-END

Two pianists, among the foremost of their art to-day, provided the more significant features of the music of Saturday and Sunday. These two were Ignace Paderewski and Harold Bauer, and both chose to be heard on the same afternoon, the former in Carnegie and the latter in Aeolian Hall. To the significance of the music provided within the programmes of some eight concerts of the week-end may also be added that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with whom Mr. Paderewski appeared as soloist.

The spectacle—it was that in several respects—of the previous Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening, when Mr. Paderewski also was the soloist, found a facile repetition on Saturday afternoon. The Polish pianist again appeared at the conclusion of the programme, this time in the E flat concerto of Beethoven, and when that was over he had the lights on the stage turned out and proceeded to regale his clamorous auditors with what amounted almost to a recital in postlude on his own account.

There is scarcely the opportunity to-day to go into detail in any descriptive review of Mr. Paderewski's playing of the Beethoven concerto. It was planned on broad lines and it contained the elements of sweep and majesty at certain times, but there was a failure to publish the intricate varieties of emotional expression that it contains. Explanations of lacunae in the execution of a great work such as the E flat concerto on the part of a pianist of renown sometimes are found in apparently—and only apparently—irrelevant matters. Perhaps such an explanation, in the present instance, may be found in the character of what Mr. Paderewski chose to play as an encore to this concerto, namely, a transcription of a piece of an opera, the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." To those who can indulge in the algebra of art the E flat concerto plus a "Liebestod" transcription may be a simple x plus y in summation.

Dr. Muck preceded Paderewski with a performance of the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky and the concerto which Mozart inserted in his "Haffner" serenade, composed for the marriage of Elizabeth Haffner in July, 1776. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, played the solo portion in the three movements with considerable skill and an appreciation of the necessities of style, while the reduced orchestra played its portion with a fine vigor that lent to Mozart more than mere charm. The performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony, especially the pizzicato-ed scherzo, was a matter of the utmost clarity, but to one lstener, at least, it lacked somewhat in emotional quality.

Mr. Bauer arranged another of those programmes which give peculiar joy to the discriminating concertgoer. This consisted of Mozart's C major fantasia, Chopin's B minor sonata, Schumann's "Papillons" and toccata, Brahms's D minor ballade and B minor capriccio, and the Cesar Franck prelude, chorale and fugue. The Chopin sonata was an especially noteworthy performance and the Cesar Franck work attained a real grandeur of expression.

The other concerts of Saturday were a benefit for the Hungarian Relief Society, at which Jan Kubelik was the chief soloist, and the joint appearance at Aeolian Hall of Mme. Buckhout, soprano, and the Tollefsen Trio. The former was enjoyed by a large audience. The latter was a miscellaneous affair not requiring particular comment.

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914

PADEREWSKI HERE IN YEAR'S LAST CONCERT

1884

Peer of Pianists Appears With Boston Symphony Orchestra Before Big Audience

CHEERED BY THE THRONG

PADEREWSKI, peer of pianists, living or dead, made wondrous music at the Boston Orchestra's final concert of the season here last evening, and the enthusiastic throng that packed the Academy of Music rose at him in old-time fervency, just as when he first startled all ears in the roaring '80s.

It was then, in the first maturity of his genius, that the virtuoso wrote the A minor concerto for piano and orchestra which was the concluding number of Doctor Muck's concert. A more impressive and artistically gratifying close of a local orchestral season could scarcely be desired or imagined.

The A minor concerto is almost an ideal composition for public exhibition of virtuoso quality. Both main themes and structural development are largely confided to the orchestral body, while the solo instrument ornaments, decorates and almost envelops the vast tonal scheme with amazing complexity and ethereal, supernal beauty of sweet sound. It is the Lisztian way, as contradistinguished from Gallic affectations that reverse this instrumental true relation.

Although the years have set their signs upon the pianist's personality, his technical skill is as astonishing as ever, his genius still free from shadow of faltering or hint of acerbity. There is still in evidence the pristine Paderewski generosity—the audience remained to applaud instead of dispersing, and were rewarded by an encore number, the artist's minuet in A minor. The no-encore rule of the Boston organization is non-existent for Paderewski. Mention here, by the way, is due to the piano—one of the finest instruments for solo work ever heard on the Academy stage.

The orchestral force, too, contributed in no slight degree to one of the most artistically perfect and most psychically effective performances of this or any other musical season.

For all thunder in the index there was Brahm's labored, highly musicological fourth symphony, of which the third movement a joyous allegro, is a gem that, "like a star in darkest night, sticks fiery off indeed." The rest seems much like some wise man vainly striving to remember lost strains of old native melody with all the choirs engaged in the task.

Afterward there were blows of Straussian sound—Richard, not Johann—in "Death and Transfiguration," superbly and speedily healed, however, by Paderewski's distinguished art.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 7 - 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 24. The interest of the concert will centre naturally in the soloist, who will be Paderewski. This will be his only ap- earance in Providence this year, and it ill be the last opportunity to hear m in several years. Paderewski has lly recovered from the indisposition hich compelled him to cancel a number his concerts on the Pacifi ccoast, and from all accounts he is playing again th all his old-time brilliancy. At the cert here he will probably play his erto in A Minor, which has not heard here in many years.

1884

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible] 5 1914

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Paderewski. He will play his own concerto in A minor, opus 17, which he wrote in 1888. The program comprises in addition to the concerto, Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony", Wagner's "Siegfried idyl, and Paul Dukas' scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The concerto is last on the program.

1884

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 15 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 17, at 4:30 o'clock. The solist will be Paderewski, whose last appearance it will be in Washington. He will play his own concerto in A minor, Opus 17, a work of great melodic charm, which he wrote in 1888. The program comprises in addition to the concerto, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried" idyl, and Paul Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The concerto is last on the program. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

1884

From POST
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date FEB 22 1914

For Next Season.

The general approval of the artists chosen for the second series of Ellis concerts to be given the coming season in Carnegie Music Hall, is evidenced in the great number of renewals received from the subscribers of the series recently brought to a close by the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Subscribers of the present season are entitled to the same seats by gving notice on or before April 1 to Miss May Beegle, representing the Ellis concerts, 1312 Farmers Bank building. Those desiring to make a change in their location will be given first consideration after April 1 in advance of new subscribers, whose orders are also now being received and filed in order of receipt.

884

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 22 1914

PADEREWSKI GIVES AN EXTRA RECITAL

k, 1884

Pianist Defies Conventional Rules at Close of Boston Symphony Concert.

HEARD BY THRONG IN CARNEGIE HALL

Programme so Arranged That Innovation Comes in Least Objectionable Manner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall did not end with Dr. Karl Muck and his musicians bowing a farewell to their multitudinous subscribers, but with Ignace Jan Paderewski, soloist of the matinee, giving a supplementary piano recital, half an hour in duration, before a throng of his most enthusiastic admirers.

Encores from soloists at symphony concerts are not usually considered quite the proper thing. But the programme, which opened with Tschaikowsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4, and included the Andante, Minuet and Rondo of Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade, had been so arranged as to permit the famous pianist to break conventional rules in the least objectionable manner. As Beethoven's Concerto in E flat major, No. 5, came last on the list, the orchestra, Dr. Muck and all these listeners whose appetite had been satisfied with two hours of music had the privilege of leaving before Paderewski indulged his devotees with a group of solo pieces comprising Liszt's transcription of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," one of Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words and several Chopin numbers.

Pianist at His Best.

In the Beethoven concerto, with the orchestra under Dr. Muck giving excellent support, Paderewski was at his best. A more impressive interpretation of this masterpiece—impressive for its dramatic sweep as well as for its finely elaborated details of dynamic shading and nuance—has not been heard in recent years. A pity under the circumstances that piano and orchestra should not have been attuned exactly to the same pitch. The difference of intonation, slight as it was, proved extremely disconcerting for sensitive ears.

After four or five recalls the lights were turned down, not as an intimation that it was time to go home, but as a suggestion that Paderewski would give soulful expression to his feelings in the semi-obscurity which his interpretative spirit craves.

Without the limitations imposed upon his poetic fancy by orchestra and conductor he was not heard to as great advantage, however. In the "Liebestod," for example, he made the same errors that had been noted in his performance of that selection at every previous hear-

Dr. [illegible]

That Dr. Muck is not an admirer of Tschaikowsky is known well. Under the circumstances one did not look forward to an inspired reading of the fourth symphony. The scherzo, however, could hardly have been played more effectively.

Concert Master Witek performed the solo violin part of the Mozart Serenade, but not with wholly happy results.

MAX SMITH.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date MA[illegible] 1914
Established

PIANO STARS FEATURES OF THE WEEK-END

Two pianists, among the foremost of their art to-day, provided the more significant features of the music of Saturday and Sunday. These two were Ignace Paderewski and Harold Bauer, and both chose to be heard on the same afternoon, the former in Carnegie and the latter in Aeolian Hall. To the significance of the music provided within the programmes of some eight concerts of the week-end may also be added that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with whom Mr. Paderewski appeared as soloist.

The spectacle—it was that in several respects—of the previous Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening, when Mr. Paderewski also was the soloist, found a facile repetition on Saturday afternoon. The Polish pianist again appeared at the conclusion of the programme, this time in the E flat concerto of Beethoven, and when that was over he had the lights on the stage turned out and proceeded to regale his clamorous auditors with what amounted almost to a recital in postlude on his own account.

There is scarcely the opportunity to-day to go into detail in any descriptive review of Mr. Paderewski's playing of the Beethoven concerto. It was planned on broad lines and it contained the elements of sweep and majesty at certain times, but there was a failure to publish the intricate varieties of emotional expression that it contains. Explanations of lacunae in the execution of a great work such as the E flat concerto on the part of a pianist of renown sometimes are found in apparently—and only apparently—irrelevant matters. Perhaps such an explanation, in the present instance, may be found in the character of what Mr. Paderewski chose to play as an encore to this concerto, namely, a transcription of a piece of an opera, the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." To those who can indulge in the algebra of art the E flat concerto plus a "Liebestod" transcription may be a simple x plus y in summation.

Dr. Muck preceded Paderewski with a performance of the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky and the concerto which Mozart inserted in his "Haffner" serenade, composed for the marriage of Elizabeth Haffner in July, 1776. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, played the solo portion in the three movements with considerable skill and an appreciation of the necessities of style, while the reduced orchestra played its portion with a fine vigor that lent to Mozart more than mere charm. The performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony, especially the pizzicato-ed scherzo, was a matter of the utmost clarity, but to one lstener, at least, it lacked somewhat in emotional quality.

Mr. Bauer arranged another of those programmes which give peculiar joy to the discriminating concertgoer. This consisted of Mozart's C major fantasia, Chopin's B minor sonata, Schumann's "Papillons" and toccata, Brahms's D minor ballade and B minor capriccio, and the Cesar Franck prelude, chorale and fugue. The Chopin sonata was an especially noteworthy performance and the Cesar Franck work attained a real grandeur of expression.

The other concerts of Saturday were a benefit for the Hungarian Relief Society, at which Jan Kubelik was the chief soloist, and the joint appearance at Aeolian Hall of Mme. Buckhout, soprano, and the Tollefsen Trio. The former was enjoyed by a large audience. The latter was a miscellaneous affair not requiring particular comment.

TIGHT BINDING

From EVO. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 1919
Date

Esta 384

PIANIST [illegible]ES LYRIC AUDIENCE

Paderewski Threatens to Shut the Piano If Doors Are Opened.

From the sublime to the ridiculous—so it goes. This demonstration was given at the Lyric last night, when Ignace Jan Paderewski, pianist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last of the orchestra's concerts of the season. Partly, the trouble can be laid upon the encore, although, where an artist who knows what he wants and demands it is concerned, such an occurrence should be expected to follow the giving of an encore after the last number of a performance.

Chronologically, the orchestra gave one of the most distinctly individual, performances of Beethoven's fifth symphony ever heard here. Next it played Mozart's Haffner Serenade in D major—four movements—from which Baltimore has been spared many hearings. Next came the Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, by and with Mr. Paderewski. It was played with rare splendor.

Vehement applause came from the enthusiasts. Paderewski acknowledged it several times by appearances upon the stage. It continued. Some vocalized their feelings, adding to the hubbub. Then was the climax shattered at a blow.

Climax Shattered.

Paderewski appeared again, hesitated, and, amid shouts of approbation, went to the piano. Seating himself, he touched off a few choral broadsides to restore order. Following the direction of his shots after the smoke had cleared away he saw some of the audience still struggling at the doors. Irresolutely at first, he arose; then slowly but deliberately he walked off the stage, pausing long enough, midway, to make a significant gesture toward the doors.

There was momentary silence. Then the applause began anew. Becoming sufficiently strong, Paderewski appeared once more, and went to the piano again. Again he seated himself; but just before he put his hands to the keys, he swung around to the audience and said in distinct, biting English:

"Either the doors or the piano must be shut!"

Then, the rebuke administered, he played two numbers without intermission and departed.

Inglorious finish to a memorable occasion, wasn't it?

It was in a splendid frame of mind the audience listened to the extra pieces, wasn't it?

How much better it would have been to go away from the concert with unmarred elation! How much worse it was that events were such as to cause a mental "dark-brown taste" upon "the morning after," and to make ring through one's head: "If only there had not been a 'scene'!" every time the thought returned: "How magnificently he played the concerto!"

Ah, well! Cry, if you will: "Long live the concert!" but shout with a vim: "Down with the encore!" and back it up!

It is a nuisance and an injustice at the same time, and the greater the performance the worse the offense. After a performance in which the artist has given unsparingly of his best, it is rarely possible for him to exceed it with an encore. The reverse is true, almost invariably. Thus, the encore is unfortunate from the standpoint of artistic effort. On the other hand encores should not be expected for reasons of due consideration for the performer.

Paderewski's protest, if not due to justifiable sensitiveness, may have been due to physical condition. Throughout the concerto, when he was not playing he was fidgeting, rubbing his hands and pushing his coat sleeves from his wrists restlessly, incesantly. He appeared to be unusually nervous. He made not only the audience so, to, but also the piano, such was the force he used in playing the loudest passages. The piano showed dur loudest pasages. The piano showed during the encores that it "felt all unstrung."

However, Paderewski's playing of his concerto was truly superb and demonstrated how inartistic and how incusable were some of the onslaughts he made upon the piano when he appeared here in recital a few months ago. The composition itself is a monument of musicianly construction, and the fact that it was composed when he was 28 years old—which was nearly 26 years ago—is an indication of his great capacity.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, in C minor, was particularly robust and distinctive, as given last night by the symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck seemed to have taken particular pains with it. Many of the effects produced were great improvements over those often heard.

Melody Obscured.

It seemed the opening of the symphony was quite perfunctory, but this condition disappeared rapidly. Then it became manifest that, in the ardor of the performance, the wind instruments were out of tune occasionally with the strings. Then in the loud passages the trumpets were prominent in the most unmelodic and unsuitable places; and, to cap the disproportion, the drummer hammered away as if his life depended upon it. We have always been taught that Beethoven excelled in his knowledge of how to use the kettledrums or tympani. It didn't sound like it last night. Moreover, there was much "business" which counted for nothing, and many times when the melody, which is the life of music, was obscured or lost.

However, the fine moments were in the majority. One of these was in the passage which connects the third and the fourth movements. The work of the [illegible] in the softer parts was excellent.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

Es 1884

BOSTONIANS AT THEIR BEST WITH PADEREWSKI

Hundreds Unable Even to Obtain Standing Room at Final Concert in Carnegie.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, under the admired conductorship of Dr. Muck, took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, which was besieged by countless concert-goers unable to buy even standing room. Even the fortunate ticket-holders found it hard to push their way into the building, which was uncomfortably crowded.

But no one murmured and no one regretted the discomfort during the performance.

The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's No. 4 Symphony, in F minor, a work which gains in interest on each re-hearing. It has not the sentimental charm of the "Pathetic." And on the other hand, it has much dash and character.

The executive and interpretative difficulties of the work might terrify most orchestras. To the Bostonians they seemed far from child's play. But, under Dr. Muck's inspiring guidance, they were mastered in the most brilliant style.

Tschaikowsky's No. 4 was dedicated to "his best friend," the strange and aloof woman who, by providing him with a pension, freed him from embarrassments and enabled him to compose in peace. Unlike most stories of the kind, this one did not end in a love affair. The symphony is more steeped in Russian feeling than most other works of its inventor. In the second of the four movements (Andantino) the feeling is melancholy. In the third (a marvellous scherzo) it is fantastic. While in the final (an allegro, with a familiar folk-song theme as its backbone,) it is wild and untrammelled.

Seldom have the thorough organization, the precision and authority of the Bostonian players been more splendidly illustrated than in their rendering of the Scherzo (with its three contrasted pizzicato themes) and the finale, an absolute riot of tone. Dr. Muck took both these movements at a speed which put his musicians to uusual tests.

The second part of the Bostonians' programme yesterday was divided between three selections from the formal but, in its own way, charming "Haffner" Serenade of Mozart and the beautiful fifth concerto for pianoforte of Beethoven, with Paderewski again as soloist.

Altogether the last concert of our distinguished visitors was a delight, and left one hungry for their next appearance here.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

1 1884

DR. MUCK CONCERTS END

Bostonians Give Last Performance for Season.

Dr. Carl Muck and his Bostonians gave their tenth and last concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and all lovers of the best in music will grieve until these thriee welcome visitors come to us again next year.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony was the major work chosen by Dr. Muck for his season's farewell, and of it the great band gave a performance which for spirit, for clarity of tone and detail, for perfect adjustment and balance was well-nigh perfect. The scherzo was in particular given a most brilliant performance, and the huge audience forced Dr. Muck and his musicians to bow their acknowledgments again and again. The Mozart Serenade in D major gave Dr. Muck an opportunity to show his feeling for the classic style, and the orchestra responded with a sweep and breadth of treatment that was masterful.

Mr. Paderewski was the assisting artist, and his playing of the Beethoven "Emperor Concerto" was as fine an offering as the Polish pianist has given New York this year. In delicacy, in rhythmic sense, in poetry of conception it was the performance of a great master. In the sublime adagio surely the angels themselves were singing!

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
MAR 20 1914
Date

Estab 4

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Paderewski with Boston Orchestra.

Two of the leading American composers, George W. Chadwick and Rubin Goldmark, were represented on last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So was Ignace Jan Paderewski, who played his own concerto. In Boston, where this same programme was played last week, these three composers were all present; in Carnegie Hall the audience was able to applaud only two of them, Mr. Chadwick being kept in Boston by his duties as director of the New England Conservatory. Probably he might have found time to come down if a new work of his had been played; but the composition on the programme was his twenty-year-old third symphony, which has been played here repeatedly. This symphony received a prize of $300 from the National Conservatory of Music of New York at the time when Dr. Dvorák was its director, and it is dedicated to Theodore Thomas. It is a musicianly work, skilfully constructed and artistically orchestrated. Among the details that might be dwelt on were it a novelty are some exquisite pianissimo passages, which Dr. Muck and his experts revealed with great clearness and charm.

Rubin Goldmark's name also is linked with that of Dr. Dvorák at the time when he presided over the National Conservatory. Indeed, half a dozen young Americans who have since become famous got instruction and inspiration from the creator of the "New World" symphony at that time. One day, when young Goldmark (who is a nephew of the composer of the "Queen of Sheba") brought to Dvorák a new piece, the latter looked it over and exclaimed: "Now there are two Goldmarks." Everybody agreed with this when, some years later, Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall and elsewhere—a composition almost as gorgeous in its coloring as the Oriental "Sakuntala" of his uncle Karl, and which it would be a great pleasure to hear again.

The new tone poem, which is entitled "Samson," is more mature than "Hiawatha," without being less inspired and pleasing. It has one serious fault—over-elaboration—a fault which it shares with most symphonic works, including some of the best; but as the piece is still in manuscript it will be easy to make judicious cuts. In its broad outlines it comes under the head of programme music. The first part delineates the heroic, impetuous character of Samson, foredoomed to a tragic end; in this music there is a splendid virility. In delightful contrast to it is the Delilah theme, fascinatingly set forth in diverse colors of increasing warmth. Samson's wooing is pictured in glowing tones, and then the full orchestra, with harp arpeggios, unites the Samson and Delilah themes, leading up to a fine climax for full orchestra. It is in the third part, portraying Samson's enfeebled condition, that the music might be condensed to advantage. It rises again to stirring heights in the final section. There is a fervent prayer melody, the wind instruments in detached chords portray the tugging at the temple walls, and the collapse of the temple is indicated by an outburst of the full orchestra.

In depicting these scenes in tone Mr. Goldmark shows himself a thorough craftsman, and what is infinitely more important, an inventor of themes that have individuality. The orchestral colors are even more glowing and varied than in "Hiawatha." The audience was enthusiastic, and after Dr. Muck had been thanked in the usual way for an admirable performance, all faces were turned to the box in which the composer sat. He had to get up and bow repeatedly. It was an incident which recalled the proudest episode in the history of the New York Philharmonic, when Dr. Dvorák was applauded after the first performance anywhere, under Anton Seidl, of the "New World Symphony."

Encores are not permitted at the Boston Symphony concerts. Experience, however, has shown that when Paderewski is soloist the audience simply insists on having some. So it was wisely arranged that he should have the last number on the programme, so that the enthusiasts might have their way. Thus it came about that after the great pianist had played his concerto he responded to the frenzied applause of the packed house by adding a Chopin mazurka and a polonaise, the one being played with rare delicacy and exotic charm, the other with splendid virility. For five minutes the enthusiasts lingered, clamoring for more, but the cold air had got in by the doors and the pianist did not dare to come on the stage again, as the slightest cold at once brings back the neuritis in his arms.

It was refreshing to see a staid and dignified Boston Symphony audience hypnotized into what some are pleased to call the "hysterical" condition of Paderewski audiences. Rarely has even he displayed his personal magnetism more irresistibly than he did in the playing of his concerto. It was as if he had made up his mind to convince the audience that this work belongs in the front rank of piano concertos. He certainly succeeded in doing so, with the noble assistance of Dr. Muck and his men, who helped the pianist in revealing subtle details of invention and beauty that were the equivalent, in the field of vision, of looking at a picture through a stereoscope. The dash and rush, the precipitate speed, the virtuosity, the passionate expression of the final allegro were simply stupendous. It was Paderewski at his greatest; and what great music it is! And to think that we might have had "Manru" at the Metropolitan this season—instead of "Julien"!

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Esta 384

PIANIST [illegible] LYRIC AUDIENCE

Paderewski Threatens to Shut the Piano If Doors Are Opened.

From the sublime to the ridiculous—so it goes. This demonstration was given at the Lyric last night, when Ignace Jan Paderewski, pianist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last of the orchestra's concerts of the season. Partly, the trouble can be laid upon the encore, although, where an artist who knows what he wants and demands it is concerned, such an occurrence should be expected to follow the giving of an encore after the last number of a performance.

Chronologically, the orchestra gave one of the most distinctly individual performances of Beethoven's fifth symphony ever heard here. Next it played Mozart's Haffner Serenade in D major—four movements—from which Baltimore has been spared many hearings. Next came the Concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, by and with Mr. Paderewski. It was played with rare splendor.

Vehement applause came from the enthusiasts. Paderewski acknowledged it several times by appearances upon the stage. It continued. Some vocalized their feelings, adding to the hubbub. Then was the climax shattered at a blow.

Climax Shattered.

Paderewski appeared again, hesitated, and, amid shouts of approbation, went to the piano. Seating himself, he touched off a few choral broadsides to restore order. Following the direction of his shots after the smoke had cleared away he saw some of the audience still struggling at the doors. Irresolutely at first, he arose; then slowly but deliberately he walked off the stage, pausing long enough, midway, to make a significant gesture toward the doors.

There was momentary silence. Then the applause began anew. Becoming sufficiently strong, Paderewski appeared once more, and went to the piano again. Again he seated himself; but just before he put his hands to the keys, he swung around to the audience and said in distinct, biting English:

"Either the doors or the piano must be shut!"

Then, the rebuke administered, he played two numbers without intermission and departed.

Inglorious finish to a memorable occasion, wasn't it?

It was in a splendid frame of mind the audience listened to the extra pieces, wasn't it?

How much better it would have been to go away from the concert with unmarred elation! How much worse it was that events were such as to cause a mental "dark-brown taste" upon "the morning after," and to make ring through one's head: "If only there had not been a 'scene'!" every time the thought returned: "How magnificently he played the concerto!"

Ah, well! Cry, if you will: "Long live the concert!" but shout with a vim: "Down with the encore!" and back it up!

It is a nuisance and an injustice at the same time, and the greater the performance the worse the offense. After a performance in which the artist has given unsparingly of his best, it is rarely possible for him to exceed it with an encore. The reverse is true, almost invariably. Thus, the encore is unfortunate from the standpoint of artistic effort. On the other hand encores should not be expected for reasons of due consideration for the performer.

Paderewski's protest, if not due to justifiable sensitiveness, may have been due to physical condition. Throughout the concerto, when he was not playing he was fidgeting, rubbing his hands and pushing his coat sleeves from his wrists restlessly, incesantly. He appeared to be unusually nervous. He made not only the audience so, to, but also the piano, such was the force he used in playing the loudest passages. The piano showed dur loudest pasages. The piano showed during the encores that it "felt all unstrung."

However, Paderewski's playing of his concerto was truly superb and demonstrated how inartistic and how incusable were some of the onslaughts he made upon the piano when he appeared here in recital a few months ago. The composition itself is a monument of musicianly construction, and the fact that it was composed when he was 28 years old—which was nearly 26 years ago—is an indication of his great capacity.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, in C minor, was particularly robust and distinctive, as given last night by the symphony orchestra. Dr. Muck seemed to have taken particular pains with it. Many of the effects produced were great improvements over those often heard.

Melody Obscured.

It seemed the opening of the symphony was quite perfunctory, but this condition disappeared rapidly. Then it became manifest that, in the ardor of the performance, the wind instruments were out of tune occasionally with the strings. Then in the loud passages the trumpets were prominent in the most unmelodic and unsuitable places; and, to cap the disproportion, the drummer hammered away as if his life depended upon it. We have always been taught that Beethoven excelled in his knowledge of how to use the kettledrums or tympani. It didn't sound like it last night. Moreover, there was much "business" which counted for nothing, and many times when the melody, which is the life of music, was obscured or lost.

However, the fine moments were in the majority. One of these was in the passage which connects the third and the fourth movements. The work of the strings in the softer parts was excellent.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date
Es 1884

BOSTONIANS AT THEIR BEST WITH PADEREWSKI

Hundreds Unable Even to Obtain Standing Room at Final Concert in Carnegie.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, under the admired conductorship of Dr. Muck, took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, which was besieged by countless concert-goers unable to buy even standing room. Even the fortunate ticket-holders found it hard to push their way into the building, which was uncomfortably crowded.

But no one murmured and no one regretted the discomfort during the performance.

The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's No. 4 Symphony, in F minor, a work which gains in interest on each re-hearing. It has not the sentimental charm of the "Pathetic." And, on the other hand, it has much dash and character.

The executive and interpretative difficulties of the work might terrify most orchestras. To the Bostonians they seemed far from child's play. But, under Dr. Muck's inspiring guidance, they were mastered in the most brilliant style.

Tschaikowsky's No. 4 was dedicated to "his best friend," the strange and aloof woman who, by providing him with a pension, freed him from embarrassments and enabled him to compose in peace. Unlike most stories of the kind, this one did not end in a love affair. The symphony is more steeped in Russian feeling than most other works of its inventor. In the second of the four movements (Andantino) the feeling is melancholy. In the third (a marvellous scherzo) it is fantastic. While in the final (an allegro, with a familiar folk-song theme as its backbone,) it is wild and untrammelled.

Seldom have the thorough organization, the precision and authority of the Bostonian players been more splendidly illustrated than in their rendering of the Scherzo (with its three contrasted pizzicato themes) and the finale, an absolute riot of tone. Dr. Muck took both these movements at a speed which put his musicians to uusual tests.

The second part of the Bostonians' programme yesterday was divided between three selections from the formal but, in its own way, charming "Haffner" Serenade of Mozart and the beautiful fifth concerto for pianoforte of Beethoven, with Paderewski again as soloist.

Altogether the last concert of our distinguished visitors was a delight, and left one hungry for their next appearance here.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date
1 1884

DR. MUCK CONCERTS END

Bostonians Give Last Performance for Season.

Dr. Carl Muck and his Bostonians gave their tenth and last concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and all lovers of the best in music will grieve until these thrice welcome visitors come to us again next year.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony was the major work chosen by Dr. Muck for his season's farewell, and of it the great band gave a performance which for spirit, for clarity of tone and detail, for perfect adjustment and balance was well-nigh perfect. The scherzo was in particular given a most brilliant performance, and the huge audience forced Dr. Muck and his musicians to bow their acknowledgments again and again. The Mozart Serenade in D major gave Dr. Muck an opportunity to show his feeling for the classic style, and the orchestra responded with a sweep and breadth of treatment that was masterful.

Mr. Paderewski was the assisting artist, and his playing of the Beethoven "Emperor Concerto" was as fine an offering as the Polish pianist has given New York this year. In delicacy, in rhythmic sense, in poetry of conception it was the performance of a great master. In the sublime adagio surely the angels themselves were singing!

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date
Estab 4

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Paderewski with Boston Orchestra.

Two of the leading American composers, George W. Chadwick and Rubin Goldmark, were represented on last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So was Ignace Jan Paderewski, who played his own concerto. In Boston, where this same programme was played last week, these three composers were all present; in Carnegie Hall the audience was able to applaud only two of them, Mr. Chadwick being kept in Boston by his duties as director of the New England Conservatory. Probably he might have found time to come down if a new work of his had been played; but the composition on the programme was his twenty-year-old third symphony, which has been played here repeatedly. This symphony received a prize of $300 from the National Conservatory of Music of New York at the time when Dr. Dvorák was its director, and it is dedicated to Theodore Thomas. It is a musicianly work, skilfully constructed and artistically orchestrated. Among the details that might be dwelt on were it a novelty are some exquisite pianissimo passages, which Dr. Muck and his experts revealed with great clearness and charm.

Rubin Goldmark's name also is linked with that of Dr. Dvorák at the time when he presided over the National Conservatory. Indeed, half a dozen young Americans who have since become famous got instruction and inspiration from the creator of the "New World" symphony at that time. One day, when young Goldmark (who is a nephew of the composer of the "Queen of Sheba") brought to Dvorák a new piece, the latter looked it over and exclaimed: "Now there are two Goldmarks." Everybody agreed with this when, some years later, Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall and elsewhere—a composition almost as gorgeous in its coloring as the Oriental "Sakuntala" of his uncle Karl, and which it would be a great pleasure to hear again.

The new tone poem, which is entitled "Samson," is more mature than "Hiawatha," without being less inspired and pleasing. It has one serious fault—over-elaboration—a fault which it shares with most symphonic works, including some of the best; but as the piece is still in manuscript it will be easy to make judicious cuts. In its broad outlines it comes under the head of programme music. The first part delineates the heroic, impetuous character of Samson, foredoomed to a tragic end; in this music there is a splendid virility. In delightful contrast to it is the Delilah theme, fascinatingly set forth in diverse colors of increasing warmth. Samson's wooing is pictured in glowing tones, and then the full orchestra, with harp arpeggios, unites the Samson and Delilah themes, leading up to a fine climax for full orchestra. It is in the third part, portraying Samson's enfeebled condition, that the music might be condensed to advantage. It rises again to stirring heights in the final section. There is a fervent prayer melody, the wind instruments in detached chords portray the tugging at the temple walls, and the collapse of the temple is indicated by an outburst of the full orchestra.

In depicting these scenes in tone Mr. Goldmark shows himself a thorough craftsman, and what is infinitely more important, an inventor of themes that have individuality. The orchestral colors are even more glowing and varied than in "Hiawatha." The audience was enthusiastic, and after Dr. Muck had been thanked in the usual way for an admirable performance, all faces were turned to the box in which the composer sat. He had to get up and bow repeatedly. It was an incident which recalled the proudest episode in the history of the New York Philharmonic, when Dr. Dvorák was applauded after the first performance anywhere, under Anton Seidl, of the "New World Symphony."

Encores are not permitted at the Boston Symphony concerts. Experience, however, has shown that when Paderewski is soloist the audience simply insists on having some. So it was wisely arranged that he should have the last number on the programme, so that the enthusiasts might have their way. Thus it came about that after the great pianist had played his concerto he responded to the frenzied applause of the packed house by adding a Chopin mazurka and a polonaise, the one being played with rare delicacy and exotic charm, the other with splendid virility. For five minutes the enthusiasts lingered, clamoring for more, but the cold air had got in by the doors and the pianist did not dare to come on the stage again, as the slightest cold at once brings back the neuritis in his arms.

It was refreshing to see a staid and dignified Boston Symphony audience hypnotized into what some are pleased to call the "hysterical" condition of Paderewski audiences. Rarely has even he displayed his personal magnetism more irresistibly than he did in the playing of his concerto. It was as if he had made up his mind to convince the audience that this work belongs in the front rank of piano concertos. He certainly succeeded in doing so, with the noble assistance of Dr. Muck and his men, who helped the pianist in revealing subtle details of invention and beauty that were the equivalent, in the field of vision, of looking at a picture through a stereoscope. The dash and rush, the precipitate speed, the virtuosity, the passionate expression of the final allegro were simply stupendous. It was Paderewski at his greatest; and what great music it is! And to think that we might have had "Manru" at the Metropolitan this season—instead of "Julien"!

From Post
Address CHICAGO, ILLS.
Date MAR 17 1914

Old-Age Pension An Aid to Music

AT EVERY CONCERT of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra we spend a certain space of time reading the financial statement issued by the board of trustees and printed in the program. Then we look about us and calculate in a general manner the total of millions represented by the audience present, also adding to the sum the value of the audience of Saturday evening. It amounts to something very impressive.

There is a mortgage of $200,000 still pressing down on the institution, which appears as an almost inexcusable blot on the reputation of our city for doing things thoroly once they have been taken in hand. As matters stand now, the books at the close of the last season showed a balance on the right side of $132.83—which is sailing mighty close to the wind. If the mortgage were to be liquidated that would release something like $9,000 a year, which would give the management a bit of elbow room.

The vital need of the institution is the establishment of an old-age pension for the members of the orchestra who have served their time and done their share toward making this one of the great orchestras of the world. The most valuable artists cannot live forever, and long before they are ready for the final call the time of their best activities is ended, for the most elastic muscles will grow stiff with the passage of the years; then what are they to do?

In this question the Boston Symphony Orchestra already has pointed out the way by establishing an old-age pension which gives to every player of the organization who has done his service honorably, the assurance of protection against the inevitable time when his fingers can no longer respond with the spring of youth. It is practically impossible for the trustees to enter upon the solution of this problem while there still remains the weight of this mortgage, therefore it would appear as tho the time had come when the matter ought to be taken up with the determination to clear the decks of such rubbish.

The mortgage has been reduced by gifts to the amount of something more than $100,000, but it has hung for some time at the present figure, and until it shall have been extinguished altogether there is little hope that anything can be done on the subject of pensions. The artists of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are a well-paid body of men, but in these days it takes a good salary just for the mere living in comfort, and for a man to save from his salary enough for adequate living in old age is just about impossible.

In the glorious days of republican Rome Cato used to discharge his servants the moment he found that their activities were in the slightest degree impeded by age, and pointed with pride to the fact as an evidence of economy and efficiency which all others ought to imitate. We now have a different view of our responsibilities, and the world conscience has everywhere awakened to the fact that a man who has served his time with honor ought not to be cast aside like a wornout shoe. We all believe this, only we do not believe it hard enough to set to work at the solution with a will.

We know well enough that what has to be done always is done. Whether it be difficult or not, ways are found when the necessity presses with sufficient force. With all the millions that are weekly represented at the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, it is quite unthinkable that the money could not be found for these needed objects if the men made up their minds that it had to be found.

Did you ever meet an acquaintance after a six months' absence and after the usual greetings have him apologize for not writing all this time by saying that he simply could not find a moment's time? You doubtless have; and what did you think of the excuse? You knew perfectly well what to think, that they could have found the time well enough if they had been sufficiently interested.

Just run over in your mind the people whom you know are regular patrons of the orchestral concerts, with a casual computation of the sum they represent in millions, then against this total place the amount of the mortgage, $200,000. It will likely appear to you as tho it ought to be a possible deed to extinguish this mortgage for the benefit of such an institution as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Has not the time come when the matter ought to be taken up and finished for all time. Once get this incubus out of the way, a other pressing needs could be cared f but this evidently comes first. Chicago h made a magnificent beginning with its c

---

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

AMERICAN MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony by George Chadwick and Tone Poem by Rubin Goldmark.

MR. PADEREWSKI SOLOIST

He Also Appears as Composer, Playing His Own Piano Concerto.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The house was sold out and all the available standing room was occupied. This without doubt was to be attributed to the fact that the solo performer was Ignace Paderewski, the great pianist. It may interest some of the hysterical people who have recently clamored for Mr. Paderewski's gore on fallacious grounds to know that he was associated on the programme with a Jew composer, that the audience contained a large percentage of Jews, and that they applauded with equal liberality the musician of their own people and the Polish pianist.

The orchestral numbers were George W. Chadwick's F major symphony and Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson." Mr. Chadwick wrote his symphony, the third of his works in this form, some thirty years ago, and it is therefore not in the latest fashion. It shows an old fogy fondness for clearly marked tonalities, for fluent melodic thoughts, and for sharply defined rhythms. It turns not from its straight path because of simple cadences confronting its progressions, nor does become a musical Don Quixote and attack harmonic windmills with almost fatal damage to itself.

In short it is plain, unaffected music, not of the epoch making kind, but pleasant to hear and interesting to follow. It is made with skill and instrumented with taste. It has not been heard here of late, and this is to be regretted. Mr. Chadwick is one of the older generation of American composers and his works should not be left to silence. The symphony was admirably played, of course, and received applause, but not as much as it deserved.

Rubin Goldmark lives in this town. He is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the distinguished European composer. Some of the nephew's chamber music has been heard here, and it is good. His "Samson" was completed last summer in Colorado Springs, and it was heard last evening for the first time here. It is divided into three main parts, "Samson," "The Betrayal" and "The Temple." The work is built on fine musical ideas, and it is orchestrated with great technic, but as an appeal to the public it has one serious fault. It is too long.

The episodes are treated with too much detail. This impairs the musical continuity in some places, so that the intent listener becomes impatient because the poetic development is retarded. This defect can probably be remedied by condensation, provided, of course, the composer eventually comes to feel his music that way.

There is much wonderfully graphic writing in the work, especially in the long scene of the betrayal by Delilah and again in the splendid depiction of the moods of the temple and the blind Samson. It is just in the desire to be extremely graphic that the artist has (in the opinion of one observer) erred. His thoughts would strike home more surely if with his splendid technic he had been less Oriental in liberality of utterance. The composition was received with prolonged applause, to which the composer was obliged to bow from his box.

Mr. Paderewski figured also as composer, for he played his own piano concerto, which has already been played this season by Katherine Goodson. It is unnecessary again to comment on the charms of the concerto, and it need only be said that the great pianist was in excellent form last evening, and his tone had its most beautiful vocal quality. He will be heard again with the Boston Orchestra to-morrow afternoon, when he will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 1914

The last of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon attracted a huge audience to the New National Theater.

Miss Margaret Wilson, with a party of guests, occupied the Presidential box. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff had in their box Mrs. Norman William, Mme. Hauge and Mrs. George Howard.

With Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh were Mrs. Marshall and Mme. Jusserand.

Others in boxes were Mrs. Marshall Field, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Crozier and Mrs. John Hay.

Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski.

The poor downtrodden American composer one had supposed was at last getting his chance in New York, but Dr. Muck seems to be a doubter, for his visiting band from Bo made to regale the audien packed Carnegie Hall last ni
two American compositions permitting Mr. Paderewski t
the programme in his own pia certo in A minor. Dr. Muck is thorough. Were he determined one American piece on a prog
he would be sure to put on tw did not three! There were do those present yesterday who fe
the encouragment of native c
ers might be left to our local o
tras and that visiting bands,
cially the one from Boston,
limit themselves to offering u
acknowledged masterpieces of the past, varied with some unfamiliar music of undeniable importance. In bearing, Dr. Muck last night was, as always, decorous to a degree, but one wonders with what inward ironic smile he heard the applause that interrupted the scherzo of Mr. Chadwick's symphony. Really I shall not be content until I have known how that august assemblage, a Boston Symphony audience at Carnegie Hall behaves in the presence of the "Meditation" from "Thais" and the "Cavalleria Rusticana" intermezzo.

The American pieces played yesterday were the symphony in F major (No. 3) of George W. Chadwick of Boston and the tone poem "Samson" of Rubin Goldmark of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphony won twenty years ago next month a prize of $300 offered by the National Conservatory of Music, of which the head was then Dvorak. It was performed for the first time anywhere Oct. 19, 1894, in Boston. Mr. Chadwick is a good workman and he built his symphony stoutly, but in twenty years music has gone through some amazing changes. Styles perish; genius is everlasting.

The first movement of Mr. Chadwick's symphony can still be heard with pleasure, so can the trio of the scherzo, as the quickly suppressed applause that broke in after it testified. The latter is pretty music, and, as the sapient Philip Hale once declared, pretty music, like pretty women, has a distinct place in the world. The slow movement has gone the way of all flesh and most music; so, save for a passage or two, has the finale. The audience applauded the symphony heartily and the orchestra went through that tiresome and meaningless farce of rising to acknowledge with the conductor the applause.

Rubin Goldmark, who, by the way, is a nephew of Karl Goldmark, composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, the "Rustic Wedding" symphony, the opera "The Queen of Sheba," and many another work, and who happens, unlike his uncle, to be both a native and a resident of New York, has supplied the programme annotator with some valuable information about his tone poem. He tells, for instance, that the piece was completed last summer; that, though played without a break, it is written in four divisions—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," and "In the Temple." "The composition is intended to be programmatic," he adds, "in its broadest outlines only." The tone poem is still in manuscript, and had its first performance the other day in Boston.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" is music of the kind that is described often and justly as well made. He has been sparing of local color, a curious abstinence in a nephew of Karl Goldmark, who has revelled in oriental effects; he has sought to portray the tragedy itself rather than its external trappings. He is not ultra-modern in style, although the influence of Richard Strauss is at times evident. But then, Richard Strauss is no longer an ultramodern. There are three Samson themes, and yet Samson, the strong man glorying in his strength, is not indicated convincingly. The first Delilah theme, "the call of the temptress," is a singularly sour invitation. Later Delilah wooes the strong man in more sensuous tones, but the love scene between the two is a rather pallid, commonplace affair. The weakest section of the tone poem is perhaps that devoted to the betrayal and the lamentations of Samson shorn. The themes of the temple section lack somewhat in character, but of course the destruction of the fane is accomplished with plenteous noise. The audience applauded the work rapturously, and Mr. Goldmark stood up in a box and bowed his thanks.

At last came Mr. Paderewski. About the intrinsic worth of his concerto I am, to say the least, skeptical, but about the performance by Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra there can be no two opinions. Some things are so utterly superb that there is no use in trying to talk about them. After the concerto the audience, a Boston Symphony audience, pounded and shouted its joy! Of course Mr. Paderewski could not hope to escape without playing more. The fact that the stage lights were immediately extinguished did not discourage any frequenter of Paderewski recitals. The great pian-

---

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

2 AMERICAN SYMPHONIES PLAY

Dr. Carl Muck's Boston Orchestra Performs George F. Chadwick's Tone Poem in F Major and Goldmark's "Samson"

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

PURSUANT to his very courteous habit of giving American composers a fair chance each season, at the first of the fifth final pair of concerts for the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck last night interpreted the third symphony of George F. Chadwick and a new tone-poem by Rubin Goldmark.

Dr. Muck completed an unusual and in some ways a most interesting programme, with the piano Concerto in A Minor of Ignace Jan Paderewski, played by the composer and the orchestra.

The audience which enjoyed this feast of sound at Carnegie Hall was larger than ever it had been this season. Quite a hundred persons stood throughout the performance and seemed glad to get the chance of doing so.

The symphony in F major by Mr. Chadwick would do credit to any school. It sheds real lustre on the New England music records. The composer has not always reached such heights as in two movements of this work—the second (a larghetto of no little inspiration and sure musicianship), and the third (a vivace non troppo, that will bear comparison with the most classic efforts).

Clearness of thought and virility in workmanship are characteristics of the first episode (an allegro sostenuto) in the symphony. Not till the closing movement (labelled allegro molto energico) does Mr. Chadwick lose the sometimes splendid spirit which had marked at least three parts of his achievement and, above all, the third, with its opening saltarello melody. In the finale inspiration halts and fails. It grows forced and labored. But even there it does honor to the composer's scholarship and skill in conquering difficulties.

"Samson" is the subject of the new tone-poem of Rubin Goldmark, who, I need hardly say, is a nephew of the composer of the "The Queen of Sheba" and "The Cricket on the Hearth." And Samson, of course, implies the adjunction of Delilah. The scheme of this ambitious composition includes four parts or sections, played without interruption, and as a consequence somewhat trying to the listener.

Mr. Goldmark has learned his art of worthy masters. The influence of Dvorak, of his own uncle, and of Liszt, are often apparent in his treatment of his exacting theme. Most of the tone-poem is devoted to the portrayal of the hero's strength and impetuous nature. The beguilement of the warrior by Delilah is clearly suggested. So is the struggle between the perfidious-feminine and the resisting-masculine, with the final triumph of the woman. The wretched weakness of the betrayed warrior, his despair and terrific vengeance are made vivid enough in Mr. Goldmark's score, so vivid indeed as to bring portions of the work well into the field of rather imitative programme music.

The orchestration of this "Samson" is not unworthy of the older Goldmark, and its melodic qualities, if at times slightly garish, are often expressive. The work, however, would have gained by some shortening. It was very well received and played with brilliancy by the Bostonian orchestra.

Mr. Paderewski, at his artistic best, of course did justice to his very attractive concerto.

Post

From

Address CHICAGO, ILLS.

Date MAR 17 1914

Es 84

Old-Age Pension An Aid to Music

AT EVERY CONCERT of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra we spend a certain space of time reading the financial statement issued by the board of trustees and printed in the program. Then we look about us and calculate in a general manner the total of millions represented by the audience present, also adding to the sum the value of the audience of Saturday evening. It amounts to something very impressive.

There is a mortgage of $200,000 still pressing down on the institution, which appears as an almost inexcusable blot on the reputation of our city for doing things thoroly once they have been taken in hand. As matters stand now, the books at the close of the last season showed a balance on the right side of $132.83—which is sailing mighty close to the wind. If the mortgage were to be liquidated that would release something like $9,000 a year, which would give the management a bit of elbow room.

The vital need of the institution is the establishment of an old-age pension for the members of the orchestra who have served their time and done their share toward making this one of the great orchestras of the world. The most valuable artists cannot live forever, and long before they are ready for the final call the time of their best activities is ended, for the most elastic muscles will grow stiff with the passage of the years; then what are they to do?

In this question the Boston Symphony Orchestra already has pointed out the way by establishing an old-age pension which gives to every player of the organization who has done his service honorably, the assurance of protection against the inevitable time when his fingers can no longer respond with the spring of youth. It is practically impossible for the trustees to enter upon the solution of this problem while there still remains the weight of this mortgage, therefore it would appear as tho the time had come when the matter ought to be taken up with the determination to clear the decks of such rubbish.

The mortgage has been reduced by gifts to the amount of something more than $100,000, but it has hung for some time at the present figure, and until it shall have been extinguished altogether there is little hope that anything can be done on the subject of pensions. The artists of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are a well-paid body of men, but in these days it takes a good salary just for the mere living in comfort, and for a man to save from his salary enough for adequate living in old age is just about impossible.

In the glorious days of republican Rome Cato used to discharge his servants the moment he found that their activities were in the slightest degree impeded by age, and pointed with pride to the fact as an evidence of economy and efficiency which all others ought to imitate. We now have a different view of our responsibilities, and the world conscience has everywhere awakened to the fact that a man who has served his time with honor ought not to be cast aside like a wornout shoe. We all believe this, only we do not believe it hard enough to set to work at the solution with a will.

We know well enough that what has to be done always is done. Whether it be difficult or not, ways are found when the necessity presses with sufficient force. With all the millions that are weekly represented at the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, it is quite unthinkable that the money could not be found for these needed objects if the men made up their minds that it had to be found.

Did you ever meet an acquaintance after a six months' absence and after the usual greetings have him apologize for not writing all this time by saying that he simply could not find a moment's time? You doubtless have; and what did you think of the excuse? You knew perfectly well what to think, that they could have found the time well enough if they had been sufficiently interested.

Just run over in your mind the people whom you know are regular patrons of the orchestral concerts, with a casual computation of the sum they represent in millions, then against this total place the amount of the mortgage, $200,000. It will likely appear to you as tho it ought to be a possible deed to extinguish this mortgage for the benefit of such an institution as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Has not the time come when the matter ought to be taken up and finished for all time Once get this incubus out of the way, a other pressing needs could be cared f but this evidently comes first. Chicago h made a magnificent beginning with its c

---

From SUN

Address: New York City.

Date

E 1884

AMERICAN MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony by George Chadwick and Tone Poem by Rubin Goldmark.

MR. PADEREWSKI SOLOIST

He Also Appears as Composer, Playing His Own Piano Concerto.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The house was sold out and all the available standing room was occupied. This without doubt was to be attributed to the fact that the solo performer was Ignace Paderewski, the great pianist. It may interest some of the hysterical people who have recently clamored for Mr. Paderewski's gore on fallacious grounds to know that he was associated on the programme with a Jew composer, that the audience contained a large percentage of Jews, and that they applauded with equal liberality the musician of their own people and the Polish pianist.

The orchestral numbers were George W. Chadwick's F major symphony and Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson." Mr. Chadwick wrote his symphony, the third of his works in this form, some thirty years ago, and it is therefore not in the latest fashion. It shows an old fogy fondness for clearly marked tonalities, for fluent melodic thoughts, and for sharply defined rhythms. It turns not from its straight path because of simple cadences confronting its progressions, nor does become a musical Don Quixote and attack harmonic windmills with almost fatal damage to itself.

In short it is plain, unaffected music, not of the epoch making kind, but pleasant to hear and interesting to follow. It is made with skill and instrumented with taste. It has not been heard here of late, and this is to be regretted. Mr. Chadwick is one of the older generation of American composers and his works should not be left to silence. The symphony was admirably played, of course, and received applause, but not as much as it deserved.

Rubin Goldmark lives in this town He is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the distinguished European composer. Some of the nephew's chamber music has been heard here, and it is good. His "Samson" was completed last summer in Colorado Springs, and it was heard last evening for the first time here. It is divided into three main parts, "Samson," "The Betrayal" and "The Temple." The work is built on fine musical ideas, and it is orchestrated with great technic, but as an appeal to the public it has one serious fault. It is too long.

The episodes are treated with too much detail. This impairs the musical continuity in some places, so that the intent listener becomes impatient because the poetic development is retarded. This defect can probably be remedied by condensation, provided, of course, the composer eventually comes to feel his music that way.

There is much wonderfully graphic writing in the work, especially in the long scene of the betrayal by Delilah and again in the splendid depiction of the moods of the temple and the blind Samson. It is just in the desire to be extremely graphic that the artist has (in the opinion of one observer) erred. His thoughts would strike home more surely if with his splendid technic he had been less Oriental in liberality of utterance. The composition was received with prolonged applause, to which the composer was obliged to bow from his box.

Mr. Paderewski figured also as composer, for he played his own piano concerto, which has already been played this season by Katherine Goodson. It is unnecessary again to comment on the charms of the concerto, and it need only be said that the great pianist was in excellent form last evening, and his tone had its most beautiful vocal quality. He will be heard again with the Boston Orchestra to-morrow afternoon, when he will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven.

From TIMES

Address: Washington, D. C.

Date MAR 18 1914

Est 1884

—✣—

The last of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon attracted a huge audience to the New National Theater.

Miss Margaret Wilson, with a party of guests, occupied the Presidential box. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff had in their box Mrs. Norman William, Mme. Hauge and Mrs. George Howard.

With Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh were Mrs. Marshall and Mme. Jusserand.

Others in boxes were Mrs. Marshall Field, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Crozier and Mrs. John Hay.

—✣—

Address: New York City.

Date MAR 2 0 1914

Es 1884

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski.

The poor downtrodden American composer one had supposed was at last getting his chance in New York, but Dr. Muck seems to be a doubter.
for his visiting band from Bo made to regale the audie packed Carnegie Hall last ni
two American compositions permitting Mr. Paderewski t
the programme in his own pia certo in A minor. Dr. Muck is thorough. Were he determined one American piece on a prog
he would be sure to put on tw
did not three! There were do those present yesterday who fe
the encouragment of native c
ers might be left to our local o
tras and that visiting bands,
cially the one from Boston,
limit themselves to offering u
acknowledged masterpieces of the past, varied with some unfamiliar music of undeniable importance. In bearing, Dr. Muck last night was, as always, decorous to a degree, but one wonders with what inward ironic smile he heard the applause that interrupted the scherzo of Mr. Chadwick's symphony. Really I shall not be content until I have known how that august assemblage, a Boston Symphony audience at Carnegie Hall behaves in the presence of the "Meditation" from "Thaïs" and the "Cavalleria Rusticana" intermezzo.

The American pieces played yesterday were the symphony in F major (No. 3) of George W. Chadwick of Boston and the tone poem "Samson" of Rubin Goldmark of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphony won twenty years ago next month a prize of $300 offered by the National Conservatory of Music, of which the head was then Dvorak. It was performed for the first time anywhere Oct. 19, 1894, in Boston. Mr. Chadwick is a good workman and he built his symphony stoutly, but in twenty years music has gone through some amazing changes. Styles perish; genius is everlasting.

The first movement of Mr. Chadwick's symphony can still be heard with pleasure, so can the trio of the scherzo, as the quickly suppressed applause that broke in after it testified. The latter is pretty music, and, as the sapient Philip Hale once declared, pretty music, like pretty women, has a distinct place in the world. The slow movement has gone the way of all flesh and most music; so, save for a passage or two, has the finale. The audience applauded the symphony heartily and the orchestra went through that tiresome and meaningless farce of rising to acknowledge with the conductor the applause.

Rubin Goldmark, who, by the way, is a nephew of Karl Goldmark, composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, the "Rustic Wedding" symphony, the opera "The Queen of Sheba," and many another work, and who happens, unlike his uncle, to be both a native and a resident of New York, has supplied the programme annotator with some valuable information about his tone poem. He tells, for instance, that the piece was completed last summer; that, though played without a break, it is written in four divisions—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," and "In the Temple." "The composition is intended to be programmatic," he adds, "in its broadest outlines only." The tone poem is still in manuscript, and had its first performance the other day in Boston.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" is music of the kind that is described often and justly as well made. He has been sparing of local color, a curious abstinence in a nephew of Karl Goldmark, who has revelled in oriental effects; he has sought to portray the tragedy itself rather than its external trappings. He is not ultra-modern in style, although the influence of Richard Strauss is at times evident. But then, Richard Strauss is no longer an ultramodern. There are three Samson themes, and yet Samson, the strong man glorying in his strength, is not indicated convincingly. The first Delilah theme, "the call of the temptress," is a singularly sour invitation. Later Delilah wooes the strong man in more sensuous tones, but the love scene between the two is a rather pallid, commonplace affair. The weakest section of the tone poem is perhaps that devoted to the betrayal and the lamentations of Samson shorn. The themes of the temple section lack somewhat in character, but of course the destruction of the fane is accomplished with plenteous noise. The audience applauded the work rapturously, and Mr. Goldmark stood up in a box and bowed his thanks.

At last came Mr. Paderewski. About the intrinsic worth of his concerto I am, to say the least, skeptical, but about the performance by Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra there can be no two opinions. Some things are so utterly superb that there is no use in trying to talk about them. After the concerto the audience, a Boston Symphony audience, pounded and shouted its joy! Of course Mr. Paderewski could not hope to escape without playing more. The fact that the stage lights were immediately extinguished did not discourage any frequenter of Paderewski recitals. The great pian-

---

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date MAR 2

Establis

18

2 AMERICAN SYMPHONIES PLAY

Dr. Carl Muck's Boston Orchestra Performs George F. Chadwick's Tone Poem in F Major and Goldmark's "Samson"

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

PURSUANT to his very courteous habit of giving American composers a fair chance each season, at the first of the fifth final pair of concerts for the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck last night interpreted the third symphony of George F. Chadwick and a new tone-poem by Rubin Goldmark.

Dr. Muck completed an unusual and in some ways a most interesting programme, with the piano Concerto in A Minor of Ignace Jan Paderewski, played by the composer and the orchestra.

The audience which enjoyed this feast of sound at Carnegie Hall was larger than ever it had been this season. Quite a hundred persons stood throughout the performance and seemed glad to get the chance of doing so.

The symphony in F major by Mr. Chadwick would do credit to any school. It sheds real lustre on the New England music records. The composer has not always reached such heights as in two movements of this work—the second (a larghetto of no little inspiration and sure musicianship), and the third (a vivace non troppo, that will bear comparison with the most classic efforts).

Clearness of thought and virility in workmanship are characteristics of the first episode (an allegro sostenuto) in the symphony. Not till the closing movement (labelled allegro molto energico) does Mr. Chadwick lose the sometimes splendid spirit which had marked at least three parts of his achievement and, above all, the third, with its opening saltarello melody. In the finale inspiration halts and fails. It grows forced and labored. But even there it does honor to the composer's scholarship and skill in conquering difficulties.

"Samson" is the subject of the new tone-poem of Rubin Goldmark, who, I need hardly say, is a nephew of the composer of the "The Queen of Sheba" and "The Cricket on the Hearth." And Samson, of course, implies the adjunction of Delilah. The scheme of this ambitious composition includes four parts or sections, played without interruption, and as a consequence somewhat trying to the listener.

Mr. Goldmark has learned his art of worthy masters. The influence of Dvorak, of his own uncle, and of Liszt, are often apparent in his treatment of his exacting theme. Most of the tone-poem is devoted to the portrayal of the hero's strength and impetuous nature. The beguilement of the warrior by Delilah is clearly suggested. So is the struggle between the perfidious-feminine and the resisting-masculine, with the final triumph of the woman. The wretched weakness of the betrayed warrior, his despair and terrific vengeance are made vivid enough in Mr. Goldmark's score, so vivid indeed as to bring portions of the work well into the field of rather imitative programme music.

The orchestration of this "Samson" is not unworthy of the older Goldmark, and its melodic qualities, if at times slightly garish, are often expressive. The work, however, would have gained by some shortening. It was very well received and played with brilliancy by the Bostonian orchestra.

Mr. Paderewski, at his artistic best, of course did justice to his very attractive concerto.

From Post
Address CHICAGO, ILLS.
Date MAR 17 1914
Est 1884

Old-Age Pension An Aid to Music

AT EVERY CONCERT of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra we spend a certain space of time reading the financial statement issued by the board of trustees and printed in the program. Then we look about us and calculate in a general manner the total of millions represented by the audience present, also adding to the sum the value of the audience of Saturday evening. It amounts to something very impressive.

There is a mortgage of $200,000 still pressing down on the institution, which appears as an almost inexcusable blot on the reputation of our city for doing things thoroly once they have been taken in hand. As matters stand now, the books at the close of the last season showed a balance on the right side of $132.83—which is sailing mighty close to the wind. If the mortgage were to be liquidated that would release something like $9,000 a year, which would give the management a bit of elbow room.

The vital need of the institution is the establishment of an old-age pension for the members of the orchestra who have served their time and done their share toward making this one of the great orchestras of the world. The most valuable artists cannot live forever, and long before they are ready for the final call the time of their best activities is ended, for the most elastic muscles will grow stiff with the passage of the years; then what are they to do?

In this question the Boston Symphony Orchestra already has pointed out the way by establishing an old-age pension which gives to every player of the organization who has done his service honorably, the assurance of protection against the inevitable time when his fingers can no longer respond with the spring of youth. It is practically impossible for the trustees to enter upon the solution of this problem while there still remains the weight of this mortgage, therefore it would appear as tho the time had come when the matter ought to be taken up with the determination to clear the decks of such rubbish.

The mortgage has been reduced by gifts to the amount of something more than $100,000, but it has hung for some time at the present figure, and until it shall have been extinguished altogether there is little hope that anything can be done on the subject of pensions. The artists of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are a well-paid body of men, but in these days it takes a good salary just for the mere living in comfort, and for a man to save from his salary enough for adequate living in old age is just about impossible.

In the glorious days of republican Rome Cato used to discharge his servants the moment he found that their activities were in the slightest degree impeded by age, and pointed with pride to the fact as an evidence of economy and efficiency which all others ought to imitate. We now have a different view of our responsibilities, and the world conscience has everywhere awakened to the fact that a man who has served his time with honor ought not to be cast aside like a wornout shoe. We all believe this, only we do not believe it hard enough to set to work at the solution with a will.

We know well enough that what has to be done always is done. Whether it be difficult or not, ways are found when the necessity presses with sufficient force. With all the millions that are weekly represented at the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, it is quite unthinkable that the money could not be found for these needed objects if the men made up their minds that it had to be found.

Did you ever meet an acquaintance after a six months' absence and after the usual greetings have him apologize for not writing all this time by saying that he simply could not find a moment's time? You doubtless have; and what did you think of the excuse? You knew perfectly well what to think, that they could have found the time well enough if they had been sufficiently interested.

Just run over in your mind the people whom you know are regular patrons of the orchestral concerts, with a casual computation of the sum they represent in millions, then against this total place the amount of the mortgage, $200,000. It will likely appear to you as tho it ought to be a possible deed to extinguish this mortgage for the benefit of such an institution as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Has not the time come when the matter ought to be taken up and finished for all time Once get this incubus out of the way, a other pressing needs could be cared f but this evidently comes first. Chicago h made a magnificent beginning with its c

---

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date
Est 1884

AMERICAN MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Symphony by George Chadwick and Tone Poem by Rubin Goldmark.

MR. PADEREWSKI SOLOIST

He Also Appears as Composer, Playing His Own Piano Concerto.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The house was sold out and all the available standing room was occupied. This without doubt was to be attributed to the fact that the solo performer was Ignace Paderewski, the great pianist. It may interest some of the hysterical people who have recently clamored for Mr. Paderewski's gore on fallacious grounds to know that he was associated on the programme with a Jew composer, that the audience contained a large percentage of Jews, and that they applauded with equal liberality the musician of their own people and the Polish pianist.

The orchestral numbers were George W. Chadwick's F major symphony and Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson." Mr. Chadwick wrote his symphony, the third of his works in this form, some thirty years ago, and it is therefore not in the latest fashion. It shows an old fogy fondness for clearly marked tonalities, for fluent melodic thoughts, and for sharply defined rhythms. It turns not from its straight path because of simple cadences confronting its progressions, nor does it become a musical Don Quixote and attack harmonic windmills with almost fatal damage to itself.

In short it is plain, unaffected music, not of the epoch making kind, but pleasant to hear and interesting to follow. It is made with skill and instrumented with taste. It has not been heard here of late, and this is to be regretted. Mr. Chadwick is one of the older generation of American composers and his works should not be left to silence. The symphony was admirably played, of course, and received applause, but not as much as it deserved.

Rubin Goldmark lives in this town. He is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the distinguished European composer. Some of the nephew's chamber music has been heard here, and it is good. His "Samson" was completed last summer in Colorado Springs, and it was heard last evening for the first time here. It is divided into three main parts, "Samson," "The Betrayal" and "The Temple." The work is built on fine musical ideas, and it is orchestrated with great technic, but as an appeal to the public it has one serious fault. It is too long.

The episodes are treated with too much detail. This impairs the musical continuity in some places, so that the intent listener becomes impatient because the poetic development is retarded. This defect can probably be remedied by condensation, provided, of course, the composer eventually comes to feel his music that way.

There is much wonderfully graphic writing in the work, especially in the long scene of the betrayal by Delilah and again in the splendid depiction of the moods of the temple and the blind Samson. It is just in the desire to be extremely graphic that the artist has (in the opinion of one observer) erred. His thoughts would strike home more surely if with his splendid technic he had been less Oriental in liberality of utterance. The composition was received with prolonged applause, to which the composer was obliged to bow from his box.

Mr. Paderewski figured also as composer, for he played his own piano concerto, which has already been played this season by Katherine Goodson. It is unnecessary again to comment on the charms of the concerto, and it need only be said that the great pianist was in excellent form last evening, and his tone had its most beautiful vocal quality. He will be heard again with the Boston Orchestra to-morrow afternoon, when he will play the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 18 1914
Date
Est 1884

—✣—

The last of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon attracted a huge audience to the New National Theater.

Miss Margaret Wilson, with a party of guests, occupied the Presidential box. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff had in their box Mrs. Norman William, Mme. Hauge and Mrs. George Howard.

With Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh were Mrs. Marshall and Mme. Jusserand.

Others in boxes were Mrs. Marshall Field, the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Crozier and Mrs. John Hay.

—✣—

[142]

Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914
Es 1884

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski.

The poor downtrodden American composer one had supposed was at last getting his chance in New York, but Dr. Muck seems to be a doubter, for his visiting band from Boston was made to regale the audience that packed Carnegie Hall last night with two American compositions before permitting Mr. Paderewski to finish the programme in his own piano concerto in A minor. Dr. Muck is always thorough. Were he determined to put one American piece on a programme he would be sure to put on two, if he did not three! There were doubtless those present yesterday who felt that the encouragment of native composers might be left to our local orchestras and that visiting bands, especially the one from Boston, might limit themselves to offering us the acknowledged masterpieces of the past, varied with some unfamiliar music of undeniable importance. In bearing, Dr. Muck last night was, as always, decorous to a degree, but one wonders with what inward ironic smile he heard the applause that interrupted the scherzo of Mr. Chadwick's symphony. Really I shall not be content until I have known how that august assemblage, a Boston Symphony audience at Carnegie Hall behaves in the presence of the "Meditation" from "Thaïs" and the "Cavalleria Rusticana" intermezzo.

The American pieces played yesterday were the symphony in F major (No. 3) of George W. Chadwick of Boston and the tone poem "Samson" of Rubin Goldmark of New York. Mr. Chadwick's symphony won twenty years ago next month a prize of $300 offered by the National Conservatory of Music, of which the head was then Dvorak. It was performed for the first time anywhere Oct. 19, 1894, in Boston. Mr. Chadwick is a good workman and he built his symphony stoutly, but in twenty years music has gone through some amazing changes. Styles perish; genius is everlasting.

The first movement of Mr. Chadwick's symphony can still be heard with pleasure, so can the trio of the scherzo, as the quickly suppressed applause that broke in after it testified. The latter is pretty music, and, as the sapient Philip Hale once declared, pretty music, like pretty women, has a distinct place in the world. The slow movement has gone the way of all flesh and most music; so, save for a passage or two, has the finale. The audience applauded the symphony heartily and the orchestra went through that tiresome and meaningless farce of rising to acknowledge with the conductor the applause.

Rubin Goldmark, who, by the way, is a nephew of Karl Goldmark, composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, the "Rustic Wedding" symphony, the opera "The Queen of Sheba," and many another work, and who happens, unlike his uncle, to be both a native and a resident of New York, has supplied the programme annotator with some valuable information about his tone poem. He tells, for instance, that the piece was completed last summer; that, though played without a break, it is written in four divisions—"Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal," and "In the Temple." "The composition is intended to be programmatic," he adds, "in its broadest outlines only." The tone poem is still in manuscript, and had its first performance the other day in Boston.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" is music of the kind that is described often and justly as well made. He has been sparing of local color, a curious abstinence in a nephew of Karl Goldmark, who has revelled in oriental effects; he has sought to portray the tragedy itself rather than its external trappings. He is not ultra-modern in style, although the influence of Richard Strauss is at times evident. But then, Richard Strauss is no longer an ultramodern. There are three Samson themes, and yet Samson, the strong man glorying in his strength, is not indicated convincingly. The first Delilah theme, "the call of the temptress," is a singularly sour invitation. Later Delilah wooes the strong man in more sensuous tones, but the love scene between the two is a rather pallid, commonplace affair. The weakest section of the tone poem is perhaps that devoted to the betrayal and the lamentations of Samson shorn. The themes of the temple section lack somewhat in character, but of course the destruction of the fane is accomplished with plenteous noise. The audience applauded the work rapturously, and Mr. Goldmark stood up in a box and bowed his thanks.

At last came Mr. Paderewski. About the intrinsic worth of his concerto I am, to say the least, skeptical, but about the performance by Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra there can be no two opinions. Some things are so utterly superb that there is no use in trying to talk about them. After the concerto the audience, a Boston Symphony audience, pounded and shouted its joy! Of course Mr. Paderewski could not hope to escape without playing more. The fact that the stage lights were immediately extinguished did not discourage any frequenter of Paderewski recitals. The great pian-

---

ERICAN
New York City.
MAR 2

2 AMERICAN SYMPHONIES PLAY

Dr. Carl Muck's Boston Orchestra Performs George F. Chadwick's Tone Poem in F Major and Goldmark's "Samson"

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

PURSUANT to his very courteous habit of giving American composers a fair chance each season, at the first of the fifth final pair of concerts for the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck last night interpreted the third symphony of George F. Chadwick and a new tone-poem by Rubin Goldmark.

Dr. Muck completed an unusual and in some ways a most interesting programme, with the piano Concerto in A Minor of Ignace Jan Paderewski, played by the composer and the orchestra.

The audience which enjoyed this feast of sound at Carnegie Hall was larger than ever it had been this season. Quite a hundred persons stood throughout the performance and seemed glad to get the chance of doing so.

The symphony in F major by Mr. Chadwick would do credit to any school. It sheds real lustre on the New England music records. The composer has not always reached such heights as in two movements of this work—the second (a larghetto of no little inspiration and sure musicianship), and the third (a vivace non troppo, that will bear comparison with the most classic efforts).

Clearness of thought and virility in workmanship are characteristics of the first episode (an allegro sostenuto) in the symphony. Not till the closing movement (labelled allegro molto energico) does Mr. Chadwick lose the sometimes splendid spirit which had marked at least three parts of his achievement and, above all, the third, with its opening saltarello melody. In the finale inspiration halts and fails. It grows forced and labored. But even there it does honor to the composer's scholarship and skill in conquering difficulties.

"Samson" is the subject of the new tone-poem of Rubin Goldmark, who, I need hardly say, is a nephew of the composer of the "The Queen of Sheba" and "The Cricket on the Hearth." And Samson, of course, implies the adjunction of Delilah. The scheme of this ambitious composition includes four parts or sections, played without interruption, and as a consequence somewhat trying to the listener.

Mr. Goldmark has learned his art of worthy masters. The influence of Dvorak, of his own uncle, and of Liszt, are often apparent in his treatment of his exacting theme. Most of the tone-poem is devoted to the portrayal of the hero's strength and impetuous nature. The beguilement of the warrior by Delilah is clearly suggested. So is the struggle between the perfidious-feminine and the resisting-masculine, with the final triumph of the woman. The wretched weakness of the betrayed warrior, his despair and terrific vengeance are made vivid enough in Mr. Goldmark's score, so vivid indeed as to bring portions of the work well into the field of rather imitative programme music.

The orchestration of this "Samson" is not unworthy of the older Goldmark, and its melodic qualities, if at times slightly garish, are often expressive. The work, however, would have gained by some shortening. It was very well received and played with brilliancy by the Bostonian orchestra.

Mr. Paderewski, at his artistic best, of course did justice to his very attractive concerto.

From EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

— Die „Bohemians", eine Vereinigung der bedeutendſten Künſtler New Yorks, haben dem Violin-Virtuoſen Karl Fleſch im McAlpin einen glänzenden Ehrenabend [illegible].

— Bei dieſer Gelegenheit entpuppte ſich Herr Auguſt Fraemke als ein großartiger Redner, der ſeine herzlichen Worte mit feinem Humor zu würzen verſteht. Auch Herr Walter Damroſch hielt eine ſchwungvolle Anſprache.

— Eine ganz beſondere Ueberraſchung bot der bekannte Celliſt Leo Schulz, der in der Maske von Franz Liszt auftrat und von der zahlreichen Geſellſchaft rauſchenden Beifall erntete.

— Der Präſident der Vereinigung Herr Franz Kneiſel machte die Honeurs, wobei er von den Vize-Präſidenten Victor Herbert, Auguſt Fraemke und Rubin Goldmark unterſtützt wurde.

— Es dürfte die Muſiker-Kreiſe intereſſiren, daß Rubin Goldmark's ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Samſon" geſtern vom Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter in New York ihre Erſtaufführung erlebte und vom Publikum ſowie der Kritik beifälligſt aufgenommen wurde.

From HERALD
Address: New
MAR 20 1914

Paderewski Is Lionized at Concert

Great Demonstration When Tawny Haired Master of the Piano Plays His Concerto.

It was an unusual programme that Dr Karl Muck presented at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, last night—the last of its evening concerts of the season. Chadwick, American and more classical in style than most moderns, either here or in Europe; Rubin Goldmark, American, but more French in his musical tastes than anything else, and Paderewski, the composer and the player, and in both rôles individual, and if not always inspired, at least incomparable.

The Chadwick work, with which Dr. Muck began his programme, was the third which he has written and was composed for a prize competition held by the National Conservatory of Music of New York in 1894, when Dvorak was its director. It was awarded the prize, but although it is scholarly music it can hardly be compared with other works of the same composer which have been presented here in the last few years.

Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson," which was played from the manuscript and for the first time in this city, is a bold work. If there is an apparent striving for effect in spots, an evident studied desire to say something new, to make the instruments produce unusual effects, which is one of the most prominent characteristics of the French school, there were many moments of real beauty where the desired effect was procured naturally yet in an original way. It is a work full of loud trumpet crashes and sharp contrasts. The prolonged applause with which its performance was followed finally brought the composer, who was occupying a box, to his feet to bow his acknowledgments.

The real climax of the concert, however, was Paderewski playing his own piano concerto. Not only is the work one of real interest, as was noted recently when it was played by Miss Katherine Goodson at a Symphony Society concert, though it is not often heard nowadays, but it was played powerfully, yet poetically, and a real demonstration prevailed at the end, many persons remaining in their seats after the concert to see the pianist make repeated bows, or perhaps in the expectation of an encore, which was not forthcoming.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Classic Symphony Form Described by Carl Fique at the Academy.

The greater part of the programme which is to be given this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, was explained by Carl Fique in the lecture hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. Mr. Fique began by describing the formal structure of the classic symphony, and called Johannes Brahms the last of the great classic composers and the end of a chain, of which Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn were links.

As an interesting personal reminiscence, Mr. Fique told how, as a young music student, he had heard the "Fourth Symphony" played under the personal direction of the Leipsig Gewandhaus. Brahms' interpretation was remarkable for its change and freedom of tempo, and at times gave the impression of the improvisations of a genial pianist. With all his classic severity he was full of fire and temperament. Mr. Fique devoted the greater part of his time to a detailed explanation of all the melodies and motives of the "E Minor Symphony," and his playing revealed a fine knowledge of the Brahms style and spirit.

Richard Wagner is represented on this month's programme by his "Siegfried Idyl." Wagner was at work on his music drama, "Siegfried," when his wife, Cosima, presented him with a son, who was christened Siegfried. In celebration of this happy event Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyl," a a charming tone poem based upon the leading motives from "Siegfried" and interwoven with an old German cradle song. After introducing the separate motives, Mr. Fique played the "Idyl" in its entirety, bringing out the orchestral coloring most admirably.

Regarding the Paderewski piano concerto, Mr. Fique regretted that he could not obtain a copy of the score, and consequently could not comment upon it. "But," he added, "Mr. Paderewski's playing of his own composition will be attractive and interesting even without previous explanation."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1914

PADEREWSKI KNOCKS OUT ROSE BUSH

With Precious Fingers He Puts Away Blooms That Screened His Piano Keyboard.

With a right short-arm jab, delivered in view of more than two thousand spectators, Paderewski last night planted his two $20,000 apiece knuckles in the solar plexus of a thorny rose bush on the stage of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The bush moved a little during an intermission in the concert, stood so its top screened the tawny haired musician's hands and the keyboard of the piano from the view of a part of the audience.

Paderewski lost .3164 of a square inch of epidermis of an estimated value of some thousands of dollars, from the backs of his wonderful fingers when he corkscrewed his fist into the vitals of the thorny bush, which lost its equilibrium. It reeled toward the footlights and almost went into the muzzle of a bass horn.

The pianist then played in masterly style his own concerto in A minor, of which the orchestra had been playing the prelude when the blow was struck. It was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Paderewski was soloist.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 21 1914

STEERED 'EM FROM MOVIES.

Guide Sees that Paderewski Concert Goers Get in Right Hall.

Since motion pictures of Hugo's "Les Miserables" have been on exhibition in Carnegie Lyceum audiences on their way to attend the various concerts and recitals held in other parts of the big building, at Seventh avenue and Fifty-seventh street, have been put to much confusion. Many people, intent upon gratifying the yearning of their souls for musical art, have found themselves sitting by mistake in contemplation of the movie show.

When Paderewski appeared as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at the greatest concert event of the season, the management of Carnegie Hall attempted to facilitate matters for the music lovers. They stationed a guide in the outer foyer to send the crowds to their proper places.

So while the audiences were assembling they heard this announcement shouted at half-minute intervals:

"Boston Symphony and Paderewski upstairs! 'Les Miserables' down in the basement!"

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 20

Paderewski with Boston Orchestra

By Sylvester Rawling

DR. KARL MUCK permitted the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night to finish as a Paderewski recital. There was a capacity house, with many seekers for admission turned away. The distinguished pianist was soloist in his ow certo in A minor, opus 17, th ing of which evoked a tribu may be said to be unparalle cause of the musical qualit social distinction of the aud He was called out many time he played two—or was it three tra numbers before anybody go home.

That the demonstration was n surprise may be inferred from placing of Mr. Paderewski at end of the programme and the d ening of the stage soon after the plause began so that he could play in the atmosphere he loves; but was it a good precedent to set? Mr. Paderewski's greatness is beyond dispute. He has given and may continue to give his own recitals where the faithful may worship at his feet as ardently and as long as he wills; but the Boston Orchestra has a record of achievement that scarcely may be eclipsed throughout the world. Isn't something due to its own pride of place?

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme was American. It began with Chadwick's symphony in F major, a virile work, individual as well as melodious, well worth hearing more often than we do. Then followed Rubin Goldmark's tone poem, "Samson," played for the first time here. It was finished only last August by the side of Cheyenne Mountain, near Colorado Springs, where I had the pleasure of meeting the composer while he was still at work upon it. Mr. Goldmark was born in New York and was educated at the City College. The composition, which is richly colored and finely orchestrated, has many touches of originality. That it is free from suggestion it would be idle to deny. What young composer can get away from the influences of Wagner, or Richard Strauss, or Debussy, if his mind and ears are alert?

Dr. Muck and his musicians maintained the supremacy of the premier orchestra throughout the programme.

appeal of the concer its intensely passionate pas the piano, which give the vir est opportunity to emphasize simo in marked contrast with ly shaded pianissimo which s of long and arduous training. y when the arranged program oston Symphony is concluded, ence, well knowing the rule encores, quietly files out, but not so last evening. It stayed, clearly with the intent to hear more from Paderewski himself, and in this it was not disappointed. After repeated "calls" he played a solo composition of his ow and followed it with Liszt's Hungaria Rhapsody, No. 6.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 18 1914
Date

Fashionable Throng at Concert.

Miss Margaret Wilson occupied a box at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and was accompanied by Mrs. Franklin Lane and a number of other friends. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained, among others, in their box Prince Munster, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. George Howard, and Mr. Thomas Bowers.

Mme. Jusserand and Mrs. Garrison were among the guests in Mrs. William Crozier's box. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had in her box Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Bryan, Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Hulp, and Miss Virginia Mott.

Mrs. Marshall Field had with her the Hon. Henry White and Mrs. White, Mrs. Bryan Lathrop, of Chicago; Mrs. Blaine Beale, Mrs. Slater, and Mrs. Albert Beveridge. Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mrs. Corbin, and Mrs. Preston Gibson were in Mrs. McMillan's box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner also had guests in their box.

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Martha Bowers, Miss Sophy Johnston, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Houston, the Misses Thatcher, Miss Helen Walcott, Miss Lee, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Dr. and Mrs. Tom Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Frederick Wilson, Mr. Charles Richardson, Mrs. Edmund Bonaffon, Viscountess de Sibour, Miss Perin, Mr. Charles Howe, Lady Spring-Rice, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mrs. William Barrett Ridgely, Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, Mrs. W. F. Dennis, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Gist Blair, Mrs. Walter Wilcox, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Charles Hughes, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. John S. Harlan, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Mrs. Thomas Symons, Miss Montgomery, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Christian Hemmick, the Misses Patten, Mr. and Mrs. Corcoran Thom, Mrs. Huidekoper, Mr. Frederick Huidekoper, Miss Sargeant, and Miss Sibert.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 17

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Muck's Players Give Final Concert at Academy With Paderewski as Soloist

WITH Paderewski as soloist, the B ton Symphony Orchestra gave fifth and final concert of its season Philadelphia, at the Academy of M last evening. The house was crow to the doors; the players evidently the inspiration which comes of a l and enthusiastic audience, and the posedly inviolable rule prohibiting cores, laid down by Dr. Karl Muck, rector of the orchestra, was t broken by the star of the evening.

Dr. Muck's program was distin modern, comprising only three num but numbers rich in coloring and ceptionally difficult of rendition. The works played were the seldom-heard Brahms Symphony in E Minor, known commonly as the "Fourth Symphony;" Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Paderewski's own concarto in A Minor with the composer himself as performer of the piano score.

The four movements of the Brahms symphony were played admirably, which is saying much because of the sharp contrasts presented by them. In the opening allegro non troppo the brass choir displayed that sonority and precision so often sought for by conductors but not always obtained, while in the ensuing andante movement the orchestra, especially in the strings, sang the pianissimo passages with that gentle, rhythmic tone that thrills yet lulls.

In the two final movements—the allegro giocoso and allegro energico e passionato—the men from Boston proved their claim to a place among the foremost symphony orchestras. One hundred strong, they made the very rafters of the old Academy ring with the volume of tone produced. There was almost a cheer in addition to the vigorous handclapping with which the audience rewarded their efforts.

Paderewski's appearance on the platform was a signal for an outburst of applause seldom accorded artists prior to playing, and it quickly became apparent that Dr. Muck had made no mistake in selecting a work by the Pole himself as the vehicle for display of the powers of both the orchestra and solo

---

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 1

PADEREWSKI TO BE SOLOIST AT NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Will Play His Own Concerto in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ignace Paderewski as soloist, and Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, will give a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. Paderewski will play his own A-minor concerto, which created much enthusiasm in Boston at the concerts there on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

In addition to the concerto the orchestra will play the popular Tschaikowsky "Fourth Symphony" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Tickets will be placed on sale at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange next Saturday morning.

[143]

From EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

1884

— Die „Bohemians", eine Vereinigung der bedeutendſten Künſtler New Yorks, haben dem Violin-Virtuoſen Karl Fleſch im McAlpin einen glänzenden Ehrenabend gegeben.

— Bei dieſer Gelegenheit entpuppte ſich Herr Auguſt Fraemke als ein großartiger Redner, der ſeine herzlichen Worte mit feinem Humor zu würzen verſteht. Auch Herr Walter Damroſch hielt eine ſchwungvolle Anſprache.

— Eine ganz beſondere Ueberraſchung bot der bekannte Celliſt Leo Schulz, der in der Maske von Franz Liszt auftrat und von der zahlreichen Geſellſchaft rauſchenden Beifall erntete.

— Der Präſident der Vereinigung Herr Franz Kneiſel machte die Honeurs, wobei er von den Vize-Präſidenten Victor Herbert, Auguſt Fraemke und Rubin Goldmark unterſtützt wurde.

— Es dürfte die Muſiker-Kreiſe intereſſiren, daß Rubin Goldmark's ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Samſon" geſtern vom Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter in New York ihre Erſtaufführung erlebte und vom Publikum ſowie der Kritik beifälligſt aufgenommen wurde.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
MAR 20 1914

York, 1884

Paderewski Is Lionized at Concert

Great Demonstration When Tawny Haired Master of the Piano Plays His Concerto.

It was an unusual programme that Dr Karl Muck presented at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last night—the last of its evening concerts of the season. Chadwick, American and more classical in style than most moderns, either here or in Europe; Rubin Goldmark, American, but more French in his musical tastes than anything else, and Paderewski, the composer and the player, and in both rôles individual, and if not always inspired, at least incomparable.

The Chadwick work, with which Dr. Muck began his programme, was the third which he has written and was composed for a prize competition held by the National Conservatory of Music of New York in 1894, when Dvorak was its director. It was awarded the prize, but although it is scholarly music it can hardly be compared with other works of the same composer which have been presented here in the last few years.

Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson," which was played from the manuscript and for the first time in this city, is a bold work. If there is an apparent striving for effect in spots, an evident studied desire to say something new, to make the instruments produce unusual effects, which is one of the most prominent characteristics of the French school, there were many moments of real beauty where the desired effect was procured naturally yet in an original way. It is a work full of loud trumpet crashes and sharp contrasts. The prolonged applause with which its performance was followed finally brought the composer, who was occupying a box, to his feet to bow his acknowledgments.

The real climax of the concert, however, was Paderewski playing his own piano concerto. Not only is the work one of real interest, as was noted recently when it was played by Miss Katherine Goodson at a Symphony Society concert, though it is not often heard nowadays, but it was played powerfully, yet poetically, and a real demonstration prevailed at the end, many persons remaining in their seats after the concert to see the pianist make repeated bows, or perhaps in the expectation of an encore, which was not forthcoming.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 20 1914

Establ

1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Classic Symphony Form Described by Carl Fique at the Academy.

The greater part of the programme which is to be given this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, was explained by Carl Fique in the lecture hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. Mr. Fique began by describing the formal structure of the classic symphony, and called Johannes Brahms the last of the great classic composers and the end of a chain, of which Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn were links.

As an interesting personal reminiscence, Mr. Fique told how, as a young music student, he had heard the "Fourth Symphony" played under the personal direction of the Leipsig Gewandhaus. Brahms' interpretation was remarkable for its change and freedom of tempo, and at times gave the impression of the improvisations of a genial pianist. With all his classic severity he was full of fire and temperament. Mr. Fique devoted the greater part of his time to a detailed explanation of all the melodies and motives of the "E Minor Symphony," and his playing revealed a fine knowledge of the Brahms style and spirit.

Richard Wagner is represented on this month's programme by his "Siegfried Idyl." Wagner was at work on his music drama, "Siegfried," when his wife, Cosima, presented him with a son, who was christened Siegfried. In celebration of this happy event Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyl," a a charming tone poem based upon the leading motives from "Siegfried" and interwoven with an old German cradle song. After introducing the separate motives, Mr. Fique played the "Idyl" in its entirety, bringing out the orchestral coloring most admirably.

Regarding the Paderewski piano concerto, Mr. Fique regretted that he could not obtain a copy of the score, and consequently could not comment upon it. "But," he added, "Mr. Paderewski's playing of his own composition will be attractive and interesting even without previous explanation."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2

New York, 1884

PADEREWSKI KNOCKS OUT ROSE BUSH

With Precious Fingers He Puts Away Blooms That Screened His Piano Keyboard.

With a right short-arm jab, delivered in view of more than two thousand spectators, Paderewski last night planted his two $20,000 apiece knuckles in the solar plexus of a thorny rose bush on the stage of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The bush moved a little during an intermission in the concert, stood so its top screened the tawny haired musician's hands and the keyboard of the piano from the view of a part of the audience.

Paderewski lost .3164 of a square inch of epidermis of an estimated value of some thousands of dollars, from the backs of his wonderful fingers when he corkscrewed his fist into the vitals of the thorny bush, which lost its equilibrium. It reeled toward the footlights and almost went into the muzzle of a bass horn.

The pianist then played, in masterly style his own concerto in A minor, of which the orchestra had been playing the prelude when the blow was struck. It was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Paderewski was soloist.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 21 1914

1884

STEERED 'EM FROM MOVIES.

Guide Sees that Paderewski Concert Goers Get in Right Hall.

Since motion pictures of Hugo's "Les Miserables" have been on exhibition in Carnegie Lyceum audiences on their way to attend the various concerts and recitals held in other parts of the big building, at Seventh avenue and Fifty-seventh street, have been put to much confusion. Many people, intent upon gratifying the yearning of their souls for musical art, have found themselves sitting by mistake in contemplation of the movie show.

When Paderewski appeared as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at the greatest concert event of the season, the management of Carnegie Hall attempted to facilitate matters for the music lovers. They stationed a guide in the outer foyer to send the crowds to their proper places.

So while the audiences were assembling they heard this announcement shouted at half-minute intervals:

"Boston Symphony and Paderewski upstairs! 'Les Miserables' down in the basement!"

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York City
Date MA

New York, 1884

Paderewski with Boston Orchestra

By Sylvester Rawling

DR. KARL MUCK permitted the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night to finish as a Paderewski recital. There was a capacity house, with many seekers for admission turned away. The distinguished pianist was soloist in his own concerto in A minor, opus 17, the playing of which evoked a tribute that may be said to be unparallele because of the musical quality and the social distinction of the audience. He was called out many times and he played two—or was it three extra numbers before anybody would go home.

That the demonstration was not a surprise may be inferred from the placing of Mr. Paderewski at the end of the programme and the darkening of the stage soon after the applause began so that he could play in the atmosphere he loves; but was it a good precedent to set? Mr. Paderewski's greatness is beyond dispute. He has given and may continue to give his own recitals where the faithful may worship at his feet as ardently and as long as he wills; but the Boston Orchestra has a record of achievement that scarcely may be eclipsed throughout the world. Isn't something due to its own pride of place?

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme was American. It began with Chadwick's symphony in F major, a virile work, individual as well as melodious, well worth hearing more often than we do. Then followed Rubin Goldmark's tone poem, "Samson," played for the first time here. It was finished only last August by the side of Cheyenne Mountain, near Colorado Springs, where I had the pleasure of meeting the composer while he was still at work upon it. Mr. Goldmark was born in New York and was educated at the City College. The composition, which is richly colored and finely orchestrated, has many touches of originality. That it is free from suggestion it would be idle to deny. What young composer can get away from the influences of Wagner, or Richard Strauss, or Debussy, if his mind and ears are alert?

Dr. Muck and his musicians maintained the supremacy of the premier orchestra throughout the programme.

appeal of the concerto lies in its intensely passionate passages for the piano, which give the virtuosest opportunity to emphasize imo in marked contrast with tely shaded pianissimo which s of long and arduous training. y when the arranged program oston Symphony is concluded, ence, well knowing the rule encores, quietly files out, but not so last evening. It stayed, clearly with the intent to hear more from Paderewski himself, and in this it was not disappointed. After repeated "calls" he played a solo composition of his own and followed it with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 1

184

Fashionable Throng at Concert.

Miss Margaret Wilson occupied a box at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and was accompanied by Mrs. Franklin Lane and a number of other friends. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained, among others, in their box Prince Munster, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. George Howard, and Mr. Thomas Bowers.

Mme. Jusserand and Mrs. Garrison were among the guests in Mrs. William Crozier's box. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had in her box Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Bryan, Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Hulp, and Miss Virginia Mott.

Mrs. Marshall Field had with her the Hon. Henry White and Mrs. White, Mrs. Bryan Lathrop, of Chicago; Mrs. Blaine Beale, Mrs. Slater, and Mrs. Albert Beveridge. Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mrs. Corbin, and Mrs. Preston Gibson were in Mrs. McMillan's box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner also had guests in their box.

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Martha Bowers, Miss Sophy Johnston, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Houston, the Misses Thatcher, Miss Helen Walcott, Miss Lee, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Dr. and Mrs. Tom Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Frederick Wilson, Mr. Charles Richardson, Mrs. Edmund Bonaffon, Viscountess de Sibour, Miss Perin, Mr. Charles Howe, Lady Spring-Rice, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mrs. William Barrett Ridgely, Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, Mrs. W. F. Dennis, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Gist Blair, Mrs. Walter Wilcox, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Charles Hughes, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. John S. Harlan, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Mrs. Thomas Symons, Miss Montgomery, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Christian Hemmick, the Misses Patten, Mr. and Mrs. Corcoran Thom, Mrs. Huidekoper, Mr. Frederic Huidekoper, Miss Sargeant, and Miss Sibert.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 17

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Muck's Players Give Final Concer at Academy With Paderewski as Soloist

WITH Paderewski as soloist, the B ton Symphony Orchestra gave fifth and final concert of its season Philadelphia, at the Academy of Mu last evening. The house was crow to the doors; the players evidently the inspiration which comes of a la and enthusiastic audience, and the s posedly inviolable rule prohibiting cores, laid down by Dr. Karl Muck, rector of the orchestra, was t broken by the star of the evening.

Dr. Muck's program was distin modern, comprising only three num but numbers rich in coloring and ceptionally difficult of rendition. The works played were the seldom-heard Brahms Symphony in E. Minor, known commonly as the "Fourth Symphony;" Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Paderewski's own concerto in A Minor with the composer himself as performer of the piano score.

The four movements of the Brahms symphony were played admirably, which is saying much because of the sharp contrasts presented by them. In the opening allegro non troppo the brass choir displayed that sonority and precision so often sought for by conductors but not always obtained, while in the ensuing andante movement the orchestra, especially in the strings, sang the pianissimo passages with that gentle, rhythmic tone that thrills yet lulls.

In the two final movements—the allegro giocoso and allegro energico e passionato—the men from Boston proved their claim to a place among the foremost symphony orchestras. One hundred strong, they made the very rafters of the old Academy ring with the volume of tone produced. There was almost a cheer in addition to the vigorous handclapping with which the audience rewarded their efforts.

Paderewski's appearance on the platform was a signal for an outburst of applause seldom accorded artists prior to playing, and it quickly became apparent that Dr. Muck had made no mistake in selecting a work by the Pole himself as the vehicle for display of the powers of both the orchestra and solo

---

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MA

PADEREWSKI TO BE SOLOIST AT NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Will Play His Own Concerto in Infantry Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ignace Paderewski as soloist, and Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, will give a concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. Paderewski will play his own A-minor concerto, which created much enthusiasm in Boston at the concerts there on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

In addition to the concerto the orchestra will play the popular Tschaikowsky "Fourth Symphony" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Tickets will be placed on sale at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange next Saturday morning.

From EVE. STAATS ZEITUNG
Address: New York City

— Die „Bohemians", eine Vereinigung der bedeutendſten Künſtler New Yorks, haben dem Violin-Virtuoſen Karl Fleſch im McAlpin einen glänzenden Ehrenabend gegeben.

— Bei dieſer Gelegenheit entpuppte ſich Herr Auguſt Fraemke als ein großartiger Redner, der ſeine herzlichen Worte mit feinem Humor zu würzen verſteht. Auch Herr Walter Damroſch hielt eine ſchwungvolle Anſprache.

— Eine ganz beſondere Ueberraſchung bot der bekannte Celliſt Leo Schulz, der in der Maske von Franz Liszt auftrat und von der zahlreichen Geſellſchaft rauſchenden Beifall erntete.

— Der Präſident der Vereinigung Herr Franz Kneiſel machte die Honeurs, wobei er von den Vize-Präſidenten Victor Herbert, Auguſt Fraemke und Rubin Goldmark unterſtützt wurde.

— Es dürfte die Muſiker-Kreiſe intereſſiren, daß Rubin Goldmark's ſymphoniſche Dichtung „Samſon" geſtern vom Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter in New York ihre Erſtaufführung erlebte und vom Publikum ſowie der Kritik beifälligſt aufgenommen wurde.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
MAR 20 1914

Paderewski Is Lionized at Concert

Great Demonstration When Tawny Haired Master of the Piano Plays His Concerto.

It was an unusual programme that Dr Karl Muck presented at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last night—the last of its evening concerts of the season. Chadwick, American and more classical in style than most moderns, either here or in Europe; Rubin Goldmark, American, but more French in his musical tastes than anything else, and Paderewski, the composer and the player, and in both rôles individual, and if not always inspired, at least incomparable.

The Chadwick work, with which Dr. Muck began his programme, was the third which he has written and was composed for a prize competition held by the National Conservatory of Music of New York in 1894, when Dvorak was its director. It was awarded the prize, but although it is scholarly music it can hardly be compared with other works of the same composer which have been presented here in the last few years.

Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson," which was played from the manuscript and for the first time in this city, is a bold work. If there is an apparent striving for effect in spots, an evident studied desire to say something new, to make the instruments produce unusual effects, which is one of the most prominent characteristics of the French school, there were many moments of real beauty where the desired effect was procured naturally yet in an original way. It is a work full of loud trumpet crashes and sharp contrasts. The prolonged applause with which its performance was followed finally brought the composer, who was occupying a box, to his feet to bow his acknowledgments.

The real climax of the concert, however, was Paderewski playing his own piano concerto. Not only is the work one of real interest, as was noted recently when it was played by Miss Katherine Goodson at a Symphony Society concert, though it is not often heard nowadays, but it was played powerfully, yet poetically, and a real demonstration prevailed at the end, many persons remaining in their seats after the concert to see the pianist make repeated bows, or perhaps in the expectation of an encore, which was not forthcoming.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 20 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY LECTURE.

Classic Symphony Form Described by Carl Fique at the Academy.

The greater part of the programme which is to be given this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music, was explained by Carl Fique in the lecture hall of the Academy yesterday afternoon. Mr. Fique began by describing the formal structure of the classic symphony, and called Johannes Brahms the last of the great classic composers and the end of a chain, of which Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn were links.

As an interesting personal reminiscence, Mr. Fique told how, as a young music student, he had heard the "Fourth Symphony" played under the personal direction of the Leipsig Gewandhaus. Brahms' interpretation was remarkable for its change and freedom of tempo, and at times gave the impression of the improvisations of a genial pianist. With all his classic severity he was full of fire and temperament. Mr. Fique devoted the greater part of his time to a detailed explanation of all the melodies and motives of the "E Minor Symphony," and his playing revealed a fine knowledge of the Brahms style and spirit.

Richard Wagner is represented on this month's programme by his "Siegfried Idyl." Wagner was at work on his music drama, "Siegfried," when his wife, Cosima, presented him with a son, who was christened Siegfried. In celebration of this happy event Wagner wrote the "Siegfried Idyl," a a charming tone poem based upon the leading motives from "Siegfried" and interwoven with an old German cradle song. After introducing the separate motives, Mr. Fique played the "Idyl" in its entirety, bringing out the orchestral coloring most admirably.

Regarding the Paderewski piano concerto, Mr. Fique regretted that he could not obtain a copy of the score, and consequently could not comment upon it. "But," he added, "Mr. Paderewski's playing of his own composition will be attractive and interesting even without previous explanation."

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2

PADEREWSKI KNOCKS OUT ROSE BUSH

With Precious Fingers He Puts Away Blooms That Screened His Piano Keyboard.

With a right short-arm jab, delivered in view of more than two thousand spectators, Paderewski last night planted his two $20,000 apiece knuckles in the solar plexus of a thorny rose bush on the stage of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The bush moved a little during an intermission in the concert, stood so its top screened the tawny haired musician's hands and the keyboard of the piano from the view of a part of the audience.

Paderewski lost .3164 of a square inch of epidermis of an estimated value of some thousands of dollars, from the backs of his wonderful fingers when he corkscrewed his fist into the vitals of the thorny bush, which lost its equilibrium. It reeled toward the footlights and almost went into the muzzle of a bass horn.

The pianist then played in masterly style his own concerto in A minor, of which the orchestra had been playing the prelude when the blow was struck. It was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Paderewski was soloist.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 21 1914

STEERED 'EM FROM MOVIES.

Guide Sees that Paderewski Concert Goers Get in Right Hall.

Since motion pictures of Hugo's "Les Miserables" have been on exhibition in Carnegie Lyceum audiences on their way to attend the various concerts and recitals held in other parts of the big building, at Seventh avenue and Fifty-seventh street, have been put to much confusion. Many people, intent upon gratifying the yearning of their souls for musical art, have found themselves sitting by mistake in contemplation of the movie show.

When Paderewski appeared as the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night at the greatest concert event of the season, the management of Carnegie Hall attempted to facilitate matters for the music lovers. They stationed a guide in the outer foyer to send the crowds to their proper places.

So while the audiences were assembling they heard this announcement shouted at half-minute intervals:

"Boston Symphony and Paderewski upstairs! 'Les Miserables' down in the basement!"

From EVE
Address:
Date

Paderewski with Bost Orch

By Sylvester Rawling

DR. KARL MUCK permitted the fifth and last evening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night to finish as a Paderewski recital. There was a capacity house, with many seekers for admission turned away. The distinguished pianist was soloist in his own concerto in A minor, opus 17, the playing of which evoked a tribute that may be said to be unparalleled because of the musical quality and social distinction of the audience. He was called out many times and he played two—or was it three?—extra numbers before anybody would go home.

That the demonstration was not a surprise may be inferred from the placing of Mr. Paderewski at the end of the programme and the darkening of the stage soon after the applause began so that he could play in the atmosphere he loves; but was it a good precedent to set? Mr. Paderewski's greatness is beyond dispute. He has given and may continue to give his own recitals where the faithful may worship at his feet as ardently and as long as he wills; but the Boston Orchestra has a record of achievement that scarcely may be eclipsed throughout the world. Isn't something due to its own pride of place?

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme was American. It began with Chadwick's symphony in F major, a virile work, individual as well as melodious, well worth hearing more often than we do. Then followed Rubin Goldmark's tone poem, "Samson," played for the first time here. It was finished only last August by the side of Cheyenne Mountain, near Colorado Springs, where I had the pleasure of meeting the composer while he was still at work upon it. Mr. Goldmark was born in New York and was educated at the City College. The composition, which is richly colored and finely orchestrated, has many touches of originality. That it is free from suggestion it would be idle to deny. What young composer can get away from the influences of Wagner, or Richard Strauss, or Debussy, if his mind and ears are alert?

Dr. Muck and his musicians maintained the supremacy of the premier orchestra throughout the programme.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 17 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Muck's Players Give Final Concert at Academy With Paderewski as Soloist

WITH Paderewski as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and final concert of its season in Philadelphia, at the Academy of Music last evening. The house was crowded to the doors; the players evidently felt the inspiration which comes of a large and enthusiastic audience, and the supposedly inviolable rule prohibiting encores, laid down by Dr. Karl Muck, director of the orchestra, was twice broken by the star of the evening.

Dr. Muck's program was distinctly modern, comprising only three numbers, but numbers rich in coloring and exceptionally difficult of rendition. The works played were the seldom-heard Brahms Symphony in E. Minor, known commonly as the "Fourth Symphony;" Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Paderewski's own concerto in A Minor with the composer himself as performer of the piano score.

The four movements of the Brahms symphony were played admirably, which is saying much because of the sharp contrasts presented by them. In the opening allegro non troppo the brass choir displayed that sonority and precision so often sought for by conductors but not always obtained, while in the ensuing andante movement the orchestra, especially in the strings, sang the pianissimo passages with that gentle, rhythmic tone that thrills yet lulls.

In the two final movements—the allegro giocoso and allegro energico e passionato—the men from Boston proved their claim to a place among the foremost symphony orchestras. One hundred strong, they made the very rafters of the old Academy ring with the volume of tone produced. There was almost a cheer in addition to the vigorous handclapping with which the audience rewarded their efforts.

Paderewski's appearance on the platform was a signal for an outburst of applause seldom accorded artists prior to playing, and it quickly became apparent that Dr. Muck had made no mistake in selecting a work by the Pole himself as the vehicle for display of the powers of both the orchestra and soloist. The appeal of the concerto lies strongly in its intensely passionate passages for the piano, which give the virtuoso fullest opportunity to emphasize the fortissimo in marked contrast with the delicately shaded pianissimo which only comes of long and arduous training.

Ordinarily when the arranged program of the Boston Symphony is concluded, the audience, well knowing the rule against encores, quietly files out, but not so last evening. It stayed, clearly with the intent to hear more from Paderewski himself, and in this it was not disappointed. After repeated "calls" he played a solo composition of his own and followed it with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6.

ST
Washington, D. C.

Fashionable Throng at Concert.

Miss Margaret Wilson occupied a box at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and was accompanied by Mrs. Franklin Lane and a number of other friends. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff entertained, among others, in their box Prince Munster, Mme. Hauge, Mrs. George Howard, and Mr. Thomas Bowers.

Mme. Jusserand and Mrs. Garrison were among the guests in Mrs. William Crozier's box. Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh had in her box Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Bryan, Mrs. Daniels, Mrs. Hulp, and Miss Virginia Mott.

Mrs. Marshall Field had with her the Hon. Henry White and Mrs. White, Mrs. Bryan Lathrop, of Chicago; Mrs. Blaine Beale, Mrs. Slater, and Mrs. Albert Beveridge. Mrs. Sheridan, Mrs. Mahlon Pitney, Mrs. Corbin, and Mrs. Preston Gibson were in Mrs. McMillan's box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner also had guests in their box.

Among those in the audience were Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Frances Noyes, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. John Crayke Simpson, Miss Martha Bowers, Miss Sophy Johnston, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Lane, Mrs. Houston, the Misses Thatcher, Miss Helen Walcott, Miss Lee, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Corbin, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Dr. and Mrs. Tom Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Frederick Wilson, Mr. Charles Richardson, Mrs. Edmund Bonaffon, Viscountess de Sibour, Miss Perin, Mr. Charles Howe, Lady Spring-Rice, Mr. Thomas Spring-Rice, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Charles C. Glover, Mrs. William Barrett Ridgely, Mrs. Lloyd W. Bowers, Mrs. W. F. Dennis, Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Gist Blair, Mrs. Walter Wilcox, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Charles Hughes, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Hitt, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. John S. Harlan, Mrs. Reynolds Hitt, Mrs. Thomas Symons, Miss Montgomery, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mr. Christian Hemmick, the Misses Patten, Mr. and Mrs. Corcoran Thom, Mrs. Huidekoper, Mr. Frederic Huidekoper, Miss Sargeant, and Miss Sibert.

BULLETIN
idence, R. I.
MA

SKI TO BE SOLOIST NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

ll Play His Own Concerto in Infantry Hall.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra, with ee Paderewski as soloist, and Dr. Muck as conductor, will give a con- in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. Paderewski will play his own A-minor concerto, which created much enthusiasm in Boston at the concerts there on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

In addition to the concerto the orchestra will play the popular Tschaikowsky "Fourth Symphony" and the overture to "Tannhauser." Tickets will be placed on sale at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange next Saturday morning.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1914

Some of the lucky 2,600 at to-day's Balaklava charge on the Boston Symphony farewell in Carnegie Hall were telling with almost unholy joy of a little incident that occurred Thursday night, when Paderewski had played, just as he was announced to do to-day. The artist's waiting room, back of the stage, is directly under some of the hundred odd studio apartments rented to local musicians in the upper parts of the hall. And while the famous pianist sat with Mme. Paderewski and his English manager, Ernest Sharpe, mentally going over the Polish dances of his piano concerto he was about to play with the orchestra, the silence was broken by strange sounds and rhythmic footsteps overhead. It soon became evident that there were at least two different dancing entertainments going on in the private studios.

Diplomacy was needed to stop that dancing. Whatever was done had to be done quickly. So Treasurer Joubert, who doesn't handle the money but just keeps the accounts, hastily located the parties and sized up the situation to Business Manager Brennan and his assistant, Mr. Spalding, thus: "They're ladies and gentlemen, all in evening dress, and they say they'll wait twenty minutes. We've got to do the handsome thing to keep 'em quiet. Will you stand for a case of champagne?"

Now those in charge of the hall, Rudolf Heck at the box office and Louis Salter at the stage door, had already taken to cyclone cellars, fearing a storm. But the urbane Charles Ellis, who's Paderewski's impresario as well as the Boston Symphony's chief philosopher and guide, handed out a $20 note and hustled Joubert over Seventh avenue to the Grenoble Hotel.

It was a sure-enough top-price article, and none of the just-as-good-as kinds, that the quick-witted aid brought back when he reappeared carrying an armful of bottles. And there wasn't a tango step heard above stairs till Paderewski left his dressing room for the stage, though there certainly was one chorus of suppressed screams when the recipients of this return courtesy heard that it was the classic Boston Symphony which rewarded their silence by "opening wine."

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

PADEREWSKI APPEARS IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Organization Gives Reuben Goldmark's Latest Tone Poem.

A capacity crowd heard not only a manuscript novelty by Rubin Goldmark at the fifth and last Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, but had the remarkable experience of seeing Ignace Jan Paderewski play the piano in a brightly illuminated room.

Many of those who listened to the Polish poet of the keyboard—and his audience included a large number of distinguished musicians besides Felix Weingartner, who with his wife was a guest of Mrs. Samuel Untermyer; Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Kurtz Schindler, conductor of the Schola Cantorum, and members of the Flonzaley and Kneisel quartets—must have been greatly surprised that he gave under such perfectly normal conditions a really stirring performance of his youthful concerto in A minor, opus 17.

They had been led to believe that he could achieve impressive results only in the shadows of a mysteriously darkened auditorium.

It was late in the evening when Paderewski appeared on the stage, for his advent had been preceded by Goldmark's bulky tone-poem, "Samson," and by Chadwick's Symphony No. 3, in F major, which opened the programme. It was much later still when he answered the final applause, for the A minor concerto shows the pianist-composer in a communicative mood. Its pretty melodic ideas are spun out at considerable length. But folk were willing to stay and gaze upon Paderewski even when the music he was playing grew somewhat monotonous.

Rubin Goldmark, too, who sat in a first tier box and was compelled to rise and bow polite acknowledgment to the plaudits of his friends and admirers, has not compressed his musical thoughts into small compass. In the radiant altitudes of Colorado Springs and the idyllic sylvan seclusion of Keene Valley, in the Adirondack Mountains, he was able to take his time in giving symphonic delineation to the biblical subject which he has set forth in four movements, played without break, which bear the descriptions "Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal" and "In the Temple."

There are times when inspiration seems to run rather low and when the composition sounds somewhat labored, but the work as a whole is a dignified and interesting effort with an instru- [illegible] investiture that reveals unusual [illegible] great originality of inven-

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 1914

PADERESWKI THRILLS AUDIENCE AT RECITAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes Final Concert of Season at New National Theater.

SPLENDID PROGRAM IS GIVEN

The symphony concerts for this season closed yesterday afternoon with the last performance of a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.. Mr Paderewski was the solist, and from the appearance of the approaches to the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock, some State function might have attracted the throngs.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 opened the program.

Of the second number the 'Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, one of his few purely orchestral works, little need be said, except that it was written to commemorate the birth of his son, Seigfried, and that it is thematically considered a miniature reflection on the third book of "The Ring." The scoring is light, and the music throughout has the delicacy and fineness of texture of the string quartet.

The third number on the program was the "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas. This extremely dramatic piece was given here by the Philharmonic Orchestra about a month ago. It depicts the comical-tragic straits of the magician's apprentice, who in the absence of his master calls into being a power that soon waxes beyond his control. The music is inspired by a poem of Goethe. The subject is of that simple nature that lends itself easily to musical representation. Dukas has summoned the most widely diverse tonal imagery to his aid in making up his picture, which for the purely concrete is a match for Richard Strauss in his most daring moods. Dr. Muck gave a veracious-spirited rendering of the work.

The program closed with the piano concerto by Mr. Paderewski; the composer at the piano. The work is built on broad lines; the orchestra equally sharing with the piano in the interest of the performance. The series of brilliant climaxs of the first movement gathers strength and power to a most brilliant close. The Romanza affords Mr. Paderewski ample scope for the skilful handling of those soft dynamics with which he begins some of his most telling piano effects; also for rtful combined lingering and breath- hastening of his sublime passages. ast movement of this concerto is a ph of brilliancy; and here as in of the first movement Mr. Paderew- ade the piano in his powerful dyna- almost a rival in volume of the stra itself.

husiasm went mad, and when Mr. rewski came out finally after sev- recalls and sat down at the piano , a cry of delight went up from excited audience. Mr. Paderewski the Chopin Prelude No. 17, and with- ising from the piano, went into the t Etude. Again he was recalled, fter sufficient insistence played the ann 'Nachtstuck No. 4." Alto- r it was a great afternoon.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 20 1914

OLD COMPOSERS NOT DISTURBED

Last Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Was of a Sort Unique.

WAS CHADWICK AND GOLDMARK

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season yesterday night at Carnegie Hall. It was mostly in F minor, by Chadwick and Goldmark. It began with the symphonic lucubration of the Chadwick.

On the whole, I am inclined to think this is one of the most remarkable symphonies ever written. It is the only one of which it could justly be said that, with the addition of a few words, and the suppression of the more exalted and high-falatin' passages, it might be turned into a most successful comic opera. The dances are there already in appropriate triviality. Mr. Chadwick seems to have suspected this himself. He relieves the monotony of his lighter, lower and easier wingings, but ponderous imitations of the solemn, well-proportioned Parthenon style of Brahms, or of the solemn stateliness of Handel. Now he is lofty; now he is gay. Now he rises to the upper aether of the academician of Bemon Hill; now he sinks into the chaste sentimentalism of well-behaved feminine Brookline.

He is austere, and then relenting. He is intellectual, and then demagogic. Surely such music is irresistible, if only those accursed geniuses had not written better stuff. In another aspect, Mr. Chadwick's symphony had the fault to be found in [illegible] ation. It wandered from style to om disconnected idea to disconn ed, like the mind of a child, havin malgam to bind into it persuasive erency.

---

As far as rhetoric and reason concerned, Rubin Goldmark's symph poem, "Samson," had much greater va It was mediocre, but it was industrio elaborated and evidently the work o serious student of composition. It lowed the lines usual in a sympho poem, lines so usual that they have b come conventional. It was well received, and the composer bowed from his box. At the same time, Saint-Saens has exhausted Samson and ourselves—with the subject. But as Uncle Goldmark wrote a "Queen of Sheba," the nephew was forced also to be scriptural, out of pious loyalty.

M. Paderewski played his own concerto, amid customary plaudits. All dead composers were permitted last night to decompose in peace.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

The audience which filled the National Theater yesterday for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included Miss Margaret Wilson and a party of friends who occupied what has come to be known as the President's box, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who entertained Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hague and Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Marshall, who was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, Mrs. William Crozier and Mrs. Marshall Field, both entertaining box parties; the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Sheridan and the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Henry C. Corbin, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Hughes, Miss Montgomery and Miss Margaretta Symons, Miss Jane Riggs, Miss Seibert, Mrs. James Parmelee, Miss Maury, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. James S. Harlan, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frances Warren, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Fremont-Smith, Mme. Calve, Miss Drain, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Thomas J. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Larcomb, Mrs. Benjamin H. Buckingham, Miss Freeman, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Isaac R. Hitt, Mrs. Huidekoper, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Edward Bonnafon, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Katherine Hill, Mrs. William R. Smith, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Noyes, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. C. C. Glover and Miss Hagner.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 181

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The fifth and last concert for this season in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at the Lyric. Paderewski will be the special feature of the concert, as he will not only be the soloist, but will play his own concerto, opus 17 in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. The Mozart Serenade in D major will be the second number on the program, which will open with Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony in C major. The present season has been, so far, the most successful the orchestra has ever given in [illegible] city.

From New Address Providence, R.
Date MAR 14 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America twenty-odd years ago but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 188 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvelous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90's and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist, is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete program. The Symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful Scherzo which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire program early in the week.

From TIM
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST FOR BOSTON PLAYERS

Shouts—actual shouts—greeted a decision by Ignace Paderewski to give just one more encore at the Academy of Music last night.

The audience of fashionables twice had expended ten-minute intervals in continuous applause, and when rewarded with its second encore a roar of approval went up that is rarely a concomitant of a concert.

And on the stage, with the lights turned out in the auditorium and only a dim funereal flicker back of him, sat the pianist with the greatest reputation in the world before his beloved instrument, pouring out his soul before a hushed, tense throng.

Following was the program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98... Brahms
- a. Allegro non troppo.
- b, Andante moderato.
- c. Allegro giocso.
- d. Allegro energico e passionato.

Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung ("Death and Transfiguration"), Op. 24........Strauss
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra ....Paderewski
Soloist—Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. Paderewski contributed a concerto that he penned himself. Unlike Liszt when he held forth as the world's foremost pianist, the subject of the present discourse has not become as famous as a composer as he has a keyboard magician. Decidedly not. But this is not saying that Paderewski cannot write impressive music; in fact, several of his pieces that are within the grasp of ordinary good players have attained quite a meed of popularity on the concert stage. But the Polish marvel early made a bid for fame as a writer of music, and by bringing forth a concerto teeming with exquisite imagery and nimble thoughts, stately chords stalking in impressive procession and technical brilliancy a-la-Paderewski-at-his-best, he became known as a promising composer as early as the eighties.

The pianist, despite a recent spell of illness, was in fine form. To describe his art is superfluous. To analyze his concerto has been done before. Suffice it to say that to the orchestra is given the basic themes for the most part, while beauteous embellishment and ornamentation constitute most of the piano solo. It is in three movements and probably its greatest weakness is an orchestration that is not up to the standard of symphonic writers by any means. But, then, folks do not pay much attention to orchestration with Paderewski at the piano.

No symphonic season is complete without some of Strauss' music—and we hear more of it every year. It is being more appreciated, too, as our ears are getting more accustomed to its peculiar euphony at times. The Brahms symphony was interpreted in wonderfully exquisite fashion, every interval of beauty and every sinuous line of counterpoint and melody, so it seemed, being given the emphasis that spells the Boston way.

The Academy was packed and scores were turned away.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

THRILLED BY PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON SYMPHONY

With the appearance in Carnegie Hall last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Conductor Muck, in conjunction with Paderewski, as soloist, the local music season put forth one of its best artistic endeavors. The auditorium was filled to the last bit of standing room.

Chadwick's symphony No. 3 opened the programme, the orchestra giving it a fine interpretation. "Samson," a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark, written last summer, had its first New York performance. It is, generally, a composition in the modern style abounding in odd harmonies and effective descriptive passages, the values of which the orchestra brought out in thrilling fashion. The audience drew an acknowledgment from the composer, who occupied a box.

Paderewski's interpretation of his own concerto in A minor was a brilliant piece of work, and aroused the audience to great enthusiasm. He subordinated himself and his piano to the orchestra and the whole composition was played with fine feeling and sincerity. As encores he played two Chopin numbers, a Nocturne and a Polonaise.

[144]

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1914

Some of the lucky 2,600 at to-day's Balaklava charge on the Boston Symphony farewell in Carnegie Hall were telling with almost unholy joy of a little incident that occurred Thursday night, when Paderewski had played, just as he was announced to do to-day. The artist's waiting room, back of the stage, is directly under some of the hundred odd studio apartments rented to local musicians in the upper parts of the hall. And while the famous pianist sat with Mme. Paderewski and his English manager, Ernest Sharpe, mentally going over the Polish dances of his piano concerto he was about to play with the orchestra, the silence was broken by strange sounds and rhythmic footsteps overhead. It soon became evident that there were at least two different dancing entertainments going on in the private studios.

Diplomacy was needed to stop that dancing. Whatever was done had to be done quickly. So Treasurer Joubert, who doesn't handle the money but just keeps the accounts, hastily located the parties and sized up the situation to Business Manager Brennan and his assistant, Mr. Spalding, thus: "They're ladies and gentlemen, all in evening dress, and they say they'll wait twenty minutes. We've got to do the handsome thing to keep 'em quiet. Will you stand for a case of champagne?"

Now those in charge of the hall, Rudolf Heck at the box office and Louis Salter at the stage door, had already taken to cyclone cellars, fearing a storm. But the urbane Charles Ellis, who's Paderewski's impresario as well as the Boston Symphony's chief philosopher and guide, handed out a $20 note and hustled Joubert over Seventh avenue to the Grenoble Hotel.

It was a sure-enough top-price article, and none of the just-as-good-as kinds, that the quick-witted aid brought back when he reappeared carrying an armful of bottles. And there wasn't a tango step heard above stairs till Paderewski left his dressing room for the stage, though there certainly was one chorus of suppressed screams when the recipients of this return courtesy heard that it was the classic Boston Symphony which rewarded their silence by "opening wine."

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

PADEREWSKI APPEARS IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Organization Gives Reuben Goldmark's Latest Tone Poem.

A capacity crowd heard not only a manuscript novelty by Rubin Goldmark at the fifth and last Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, but had the remarkable experience of seeing Ignace Jan Paderewski play the piano in a brightly illuminated room.

Many of those who listened to the Polish poet of the keyboard—and his audience included a large number of distinguished musicians besides Felix Weingartner, who with his wife was a guest of Mrs. Samuel Untermyer; Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Kurtz Schindler, conductor of the Schola Cantorum, and members of the Flonzaley and Kneisel quartets—must have been greatly surprised that he gave under such perfectly normal conditions a really stirring performance of his youthful concerto in A minor, opus 17.

They had been led to believe that he could achieve impressive results only in the shadows of a mysteriously darkened auditorium.

It was late in the evening when Paderewski appeared on the stage, for his advent had been preceded by Goldmark's bulky tone-poem, "Samson," and by Chadwick's Symphony No. 3, in F major, which opened the programme. It was much later still when he answered the final applause, for the A minor concerto shows the pianist-composer in a communicative mood. Its pretty melodic ideas are spun out at considerable length. But folk were willing to stay and gaze upon Paderewski even when the music he was playing grew somewhat monotonous.

Rubin Goldmark, too, who sat in a first tier box and was compelled to rise and bow polite acknowledgment to the plaudits of his friends and admirers, has not compressed his musical thoughts into small compass. In the radiant altitudes of Colorado Springs and the idyllic sylvan seclusion of Keene Valley, in the Adirondack Mountains, he was able to take his time in giving symphonic delineation to the biblical subject which he has set forth in four movements, played without break, which bear the descriptions "Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal" and "In the Temple."

There are times when inspiration seems to run rather low and when the composition sounds somewhat labored, but the work as a whole is a dignified and interesting effort with an instrumental investiture that reveals unusual [illegible] great originality of inven-

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 1914

PADEREWSKI THRILLS AUDIENCE AT RECITAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes Final Concert of Season at New National Theater.

SPLENDID PROGRAM IS GIVEN

The symphony concerts for this season closed yesterday afternoon with the last performance of a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.. Mr Paderewski was the solist, and from the appearance of the approaches to the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock, some State function might have attracted the throngs.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 opened the program.

Of the second number the 'Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, one of his few purely orchestral works, little need be said, except that it was written to commemorate the birth of his son, Seigfried, and that it is thematically considered a miniature reflection on the third book of "The Ring." The scoring is light, and the music throughout has the delicacy and fineness of texture of the string quartet.

The third number on the program was the "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas. This extremely dramatic piece was given here by the Philharmonic Orchestra about a month ago. It depicts the comical-tragic straits of the magician's apprentice, who in the absence of his master calls into being a power that soon waxes beyond his control. The music is inspired by a poem of Goethe. The subject is of that simple nature that lends itself easily to musical representation. Dukas has summoned the most widely diverse tonal imagery to his aid in making up his picture, which for the purely concrete is a match for Richard Strauss in his most daring moods. Dr. Muck gave a veracious-spirited rendering of the work.

The program closed with the piano concerto by Mr. Paderewski; the composer at the piano. The work is built on broad lines; the orchestra equally sharing with the piano in the interest of the performance. The series of brilliant climaxs of the first movement gathers strength and power to a most brilliant close. The Romanza affords Mr. Paderewski ample scope for the skilful handling of those soft dynamics with which he begins some of his most telling piano effects; also for [illegible] rtful combined lingering and breath- [illegible] hastening of his sublime passages. [illegible] ast movement of this concerto is a [illegible] ph of brilliancy; and here as in [illegible] of the first movement Mr. Paderew- [illegible] ade the piano in his powerful dyna- [illegible] almost a rival in volume of the [illegible] stra itself.

[illegible] husiasm went mad, and when Mr. [illegible] rewski came out finally after sev- [illegible] recalls and sat down at the piano [illegible], a cry of delight went up from [illegible] excited audience. Mr. Paderewski [illegible] the Chopin Prelude No. 17, and with- [illegible] ising from the piano, went into the [illegible] t Etude. Again he was recalled, [illegible] fter sufficient insistence played the [illegible] mann 'Nachtstuck No. 4." Alto- [illegible] r it was a great afternoon.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 20 1914

OLD COMPOSERS NOT DISTURBED

Last Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Was of a Sort Unique.

WAS CHADWICK AND GOLDMARK

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season yesterday night at Carnegie Hall. It was mostly in F minor, by Chadwick and Goldmark. It began with the symphonic lucubration of the Chadwick.

On the whole, I am inclined to think this is one of the most remarkable symphonies ever written. It is the only one of which it could justly be said that, with the addition of a few words, and the suppression of the more exalted and high-falutin' passages, it might be turned into a most successful comic opera. The dances are there already in appropriate triviality. Mr. Chadwick seems to have suspected this himself. He relieves the monotony of his lighter, lower and easier wingings, but ponderous imitations of the solemn, well-proportioned Parthenon style of Brahms, or of the solemn stateliness of Handel. Now he is lofty; now he is gay. Now he rises to the upper aether of the academician of Bemon Hill; now he sinks into the chaste sentimentalism of well-behaved feminine Brookline.

He is austere, and then relenting. He is intellectual, and then demagogic. Surely such music is irresistible, if only those accursed geniuses had not written better stuff. In another aspect, Mr. Chadwick's symphony had the fault to be found in th ing. It was without logic or lation. It wandered from style to s rom disconnected idea to disconne dea, like the mind of a child, having amalgam to bind into it persuasive erency.

As far as rhetoric and reason w concerned, Rubin Goldmark's sympho poem, "Samson," had much greater val It was mediocre, but it was industriou elaborated and evidently the work o serious student of composition. It lowed the lines usual in a sympho poem, lines so usual that they have b come conventional. It was well received, and the composer bowed from his box. At the same time, Saint-Saens has exhausted Samson and ourselves—with the subject. But as Uncle Goldmark wrote a "Queen of Sheba," the nephew was forced also to be scriptural, out of pious loyalty.

M. Paderewski played his own concerto, amid customary plaudits. All dead composers were permitted last night to decompose in peace.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

The audience which filled the National Theater yesterday for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included Miss Margaret Wilson and a party of friends who occupied what has come to be known as the President's box, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who entertained Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hague and Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Marshall, who was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, Mrs. William Crozier and Mrs. Marshall Field, both entertaining box parties; the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Sheridan and the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Henry C. Corbin, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Hughes, Miss Montgomery and Miss Margaretta Symons, Miss Jane Riggs, Miss Seibert, Mrs. James Parmelee, Miss Maury, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. James S. Harlan, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frances Warren, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Fremont-Smith, Mme. Calve, Miss Drain, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Thomas J. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Larcomb, Mrs. Benjamin H. Buckingham, Miss Freeman, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Isaac R. Hitt, Mrs. Huidekoper, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Edward Bonnafon, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Katherine Hill, Mrs. William R. Smith, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Noyes, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. C. C. Glover and Miss Hagner.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The fifth and last concert for this season in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at the Lyric. Paderewski will be the special feature of the concert, as he will not only be the soloist, but will play his own concerto, opus 17 in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. The Mozart Serenade in D major will be the second number on the program, which will open with Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony in C major. The present season has been, so far, the most s essful the orchestra has ever given in city.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R.
Date MAR 14 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America twenty-odd years ago but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 1882 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvelous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90's and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist, is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete program. The Symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful Scherzo which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire program early in the week.

From TIMES
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 17 1914

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST FOR BOSTON PLAYERS

Shouts—actual shouts—greeted a decision by Ignace Paderewski to give just one more encore at the Academy of Music last night.

The audience of fashionables twice had expended ten-minute intervals in continuous applause, and when rewarded with its second encore a roar of approval went up that is rarely a concomitant of a concert..

And on the stage, with the lights turned out in the auditorium and only a dim funereal flicker back of him, sat the pianist with the greatest reputation in the world before his beloved instrument, pouring out his soul before a hushed, tense throng.

Following was the program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98. . .Brahms
  a. Allegro non troppo.
  b. Andante moderato.
  c. Allegro giocso.
  d. Allegro energico e passionato.
Tone Poem. "Tod und Verklarung ("Death and Transfiguration"), Op. 24. . . . . . .Strauss
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra : . . . . .Paderewski
Soloist—Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. Paderewski contributed a concerto that he penned himself. Unlike Liszt when he held forth as the world's foremost pianist, the subject of the present discourse has not become as famous as a composer as he has a keyboard magician. Decidedly not. But this is not saying that Paderewski cannot write impressive music; in fact, several of his pieces that are within the grasp of ordinary good players have attained quite a meed of popularity on the concert stage. But the Polish marvel early made a bid for fame as a writer of music, and by bringing forth a concerto teeming with exquisite imagery and nimble thoughts, stately chords stalking in impressive procession and technical brilliancy a-la-Paderewski-at-his-best, he became known as a promising composer as early as the eighties.

The pianist, despite a recent spell of illness, was in fine form. To describe his art is superfluous. To analyze his concerto has been done before. Suffice it to say that to the orchestra is given the basic themes for the most part, while beauteous embellishment and ornamentation constitute most of the piano solo. It is in three movements and probably its greatest weakness is an orchestration that is not up to the standard of symphonic writers by any means. But, then, folks do not pay much attention to orchestration with Paderewski at the piano.

No symphonic season is complete without some of Strauss' music—and we hear more of it every year. It is being more appreciated, too, as our ears are getting more accustomed to its peculiar euphony at times. The Brahms symphony was interpreted in wonderfully exquisite fashion, every interval of beauty and every sinuous line of counterpoint and melody, so it seemed, being given the emphasis that spells the Boston way.

The Academy was packed and scores were turned away.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

THRILLED BY PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON SYMPHONY.

With the appearance in Carnegie Hall last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Conductor Muck, in conjunction with Paderewski, as soloist, the local music season put forth one of its best artistic endeavors. The auditorium was filled to the last bit of standing room.

Chadwick's symphony No. 3 opened the programme, the orchestra giving it a fine interpretation. "Samson," a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark, written last summer, had its first New York performance. It is, generally, a composition in the modern style abounding in odd harmonies and effective descriptive passages, the values of which the orchestra brought out in thrilling fashion. The audience drew an acknowledgment from the composer, who occupied a box.

Paderewski's interpretation of his own concerto in A minor was a brilliant piece of work, and aroused the audience to great enthusiasm. He subordinated himself and his piano to the orchestra and the whole composition was played with fine feeling and sincerity. As encores he played two Chopin numbers, a Nocturne and a Polonaise.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1914

Some of the lucky 2,600 at to-day's Balaklava charge on the Boston Symphony farewell in Carnegie Hall were telling with almost unholy joy of a little incident that occurred Thursday night, when Paderewski had played, just as he was announced to do to-day. The artist's waiting room, back of the stage, is directly under some of the hundred odd studio apartments rented to local musicians in the upper parts of the hall. And while the famous pianist sat with Mme. Paderewski and his English manager, Ernest Sharpe, mentally going over the Polish dances of his piano concerto he was about to play with the orchestra, the silence was broken by strange sounds and rhythmic footsteps overhead. It soon became evident that there were at least two different dancing entertainments going on in the private studios.

Diplomacy was needed to stop that dancing. Whatever was done had to be done quickly. So Treasurer Joubert, who doesn't handle the money but just keeps the accounts, hastily located the parties and sized up the situation to Business Manager Brennan and his assistant, Mr. Spalding, thus: "They're ladies and gentlemen, all in evening dress, and they say they'll wait twenty minutes. We've got to do the handsome thing to keep 'em quiet. Will you stand for a case of champagne?"

Now those in charge of the hall, Rudolf Heck at the box office and Louis Salter at the stage door, had already taken to cyclone cellars, fearing a storm. But the urbane Charles Ellis, who's Paderewski's impresario as well as the Boston Symphony's chief philosopher and guide, handed out a $20 note and hustled Joubert over Seventh avenue to the Grenoble Hotel.

It was a sure-enough top-price article, and none of the just-as-good-as kinds, that the quick-witted aid brought back when he reappeared carrying an armful of bottles. And there wasn't a tango step heard above stairs till Paderewski left his dressing room for the stage, though there certainly was one chorus of suppressed screams when the recipients of this return courtesy heard that it was the classic Boston Symphony which rewarded their silence by "opening wine."

From PRESS
Address: New
Date MAR

PADEREWSKI AP
IN SYMPHONY C

Boston Organizati
Reuben Goldmark's Latest Tone Poem.

A capacity crowd heard not only a manuscript novelty by Rubin Goldmark at the fifth and last Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, but had the remarkable experience of seeing Ignace Jan Paderewski play the piano in a brightly illuminated room.

Many of those who listened to the Polish poet of the keyboard—and his audience included a large number of distinguished musicians besides Felix Weingartner, who with his wife was a guest of Mrs. Samuel Untermyer; Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Kurtz Schindler, conductor of the Schola Cantorum, and members of the Flonzaley and Kneisel quartets—must have been greatly surprised that he gave under such perfectly normal conditions a really stirring performance of his youthful concerto in A minor, opus 17.

They had been led to believe that he could achieve impressive results only in the shadows of a mysteriously darkened auditorium.

It was late in the evening when Paderewski appeared on the stage, for his advent had been preceded by Goldmark's bulky tone-poem, "Samson," and by Chadwick's Symphony No. 3, in F major, which opened the programme. It was much later still when he answered the final applause, for the A minor concerto shows the pianist-composer in a communicative mood. Its pretty melodic ideas are spun out at considerable length. But folk were willing to stay and gaze upon Paderewski even when the music he was playing grew somewhat monotonous.

Rubin Goldmark, too, who sat in a first tier box and was compelled to rise and bow polite acknowledgment to the plaudits of his friends and admirers, has not compressed his musical thoughts into small compass. In the radiant altitudes of Colorado Springs and the idyllic sylvan seclusion of Keene Valley, in the Adirondack Mountains, he was able to take his time in giving symphonic delineation to the biblical subject which he has set forth in four movements, played without break, which bear the descriptions "Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal" and "In the Temple."

There are times when inspiration seems to run rather low and when the composition sounds somewhat labored, but the work as a whole is a dignified and interesting effort with an instrumental investiture that reveals unusual [illegible] great originality of inven-

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

PADEREWSKI THRILLS AUDIENCE AT RECITAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes Final Concert of Season at New National Theater.

SPLENDID PROGRAM IS GIVEN

The symphony concerts for this season closed yesterday afternoon with the last performance of a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. Mr Paderewski was the solist, and from the appearance of the approaches to the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock, some State function might have attracted the throngs.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 opened the program.

Of the second number the 'Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, one of his few purely orchestral works, little need be said, except that it was written to commemorate the birth of his son, Seigfried, and that it is thematically considered a miniature reflection on the third book of "The Ring." The scoring is light, and the music throughout has the delicacy and fineness of texture of the string quartet.

The third number on the program was the "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas. This extremely dramatic piece was given here by the Philharmonic Orchestra about a month ago. It depicts the comical-tragic straits of the magician's apprentice, who in the absence of his master calls into being a power that soon waxes beyond his control. The music is inspired by a poem of Goethe. The subject is of that simple nature that lends itself easily to musical representation. Dukas has summoned the most widely diverse tonal imagery to his aid in making up his picture, which for the purely concrete is a match for Richard Strauss in his most daring moods. Dr. Muck gave a veracious-spirited rendering of the work.

The program closed with the piano concerto by Mr. Paderewski; the composer at the piano. The work is built on broad lines; the orchestra equally sharing with the piano in the interest of the performance. The series of brilliant climaxs of the first movement gathers strength and power to a most brilliant close. The Romanza affords Mr. Paderewski ample scope for the skilful handling of those soft dynamics with which he begins some of his most telling piano effects; also for the artful combined lingering and breathless hastening of his sublime passages. The last movement of this concerto is a triumph of brilliancy; and here as in parts of the first movement Mr. Paderewski made the piano in his powerful dynamics, almost a rival in volume of the orchestra itself.

Enthusiasm went mad, and when Mr. Paderewski came out finally after several recalls and sat down at the piano again, a cry of delight went up from the excited audience. Mr. Paderewski gave the Chopin Prelude No. 17, and without rising from the piano, went into the D flat Etude. Again he was recalled, and after sufficient insistence played the Schumann 'Nachtstuck No. 4." Altogether it was a great afternoon.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2 0 1914

OLD COMPOSERS NOT DISTURBED

Last Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Was of a Sort Unique.

WAS CHADWICK AND GOLDMARK

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season yesterday night at Carnegie Hall. It was mostly in F minor, by Chadwick and Goldmark. It began with the symphonic lucubration of the Chadwick.

On the whole, I am inclined to think this is one of the most remarkable symphonies ever written. It is the only one of which it could justly be said that, with the addition of a few words, and the suppression of the more exalted and high-falutin' passages, it might be turned into a most successful comic opera. The dances are there already in appropriate triviality. Mr. Chadwick seems to have suspected this himself. He relieves the monotony of his lighter, lower and easier wingings, but ponderous imitations of the solemn, well-proportioned Parthenon style of Brahms, or of the solemn stateliness of Handel. Now he is lofty; now he is gay. Now he rises to the upper aether of the academician of Beacon Hill; now he sinks into the chaste sentimentalism of well-behaved feminine Brookline.

He is austere, and then relenting. He is intellectual, and then demagogic. Surely such music is irresistible, if only those accursed geniuses had not written better stuff. In another aspect, Mr. Chadwick's symphony had the fault to [illegible] relation. It wandered from style to style, from disconnected idea to disconnected idea, like the mind of a child, having no amalgam to bind into it persuasive coherency.

As far as rhetoric and reason were concerned, Rubin Goldmark's symphonic poem, "Samson," had much greater value. It was mediocre, but it was industriously elaborated and evidently the work of a serious student of composition. It followed the lines usual in a symphonic poem, lines so usual that they have become conventional. It was well received, and the composer bowed from his box. At the same time, Saint-Saens has exhausted Samson and ourselves with the subject. But as Uncle Goldmark wrote a "Queen of Sheba," the nephew was forced also to be scriptural, out of pious loyalty.

M. Paderewski played his own concerto, amid customary plaudits. All dead composers were permitted last night to decompose in peace.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

The audience which filled the National Theater yesterday for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included Miss Margaret Wilson and a party of friends who occupied what has come to be known as the President's box, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who entertained Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hague and Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Marshall, who was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, Mrs. William Crozier and Mrs. Marshall Field, both entertaining box parties; the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Sheridan and the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Henry C. Corbin, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Hughes, Miss Montgomery and Miss Margaretta Symons, Miss Jane Riggs, Miss Seibert, Mrs. James Parmelee, Miss Maury, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. James S. Harlan, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frances Warren, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Fremont-Smith, Mme. Calve, Miss Drain, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Thomas J. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Larcomb, Mrs. Benjamin H. Buckingham, Miss Freeman, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Isaac R. Hitt, Mrs. Huidekoper, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Edward Bonnafon, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Katherine Hill, Mrs. William R. Smith, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Noyes, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. C. C. Glover and Miss Hagner.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 18 1914

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The fifth and last concert for this season in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at the Lyric. Paderewski will be the special feature of the concert, as he will not only be the soloist, but will play his own concerto, opus 17 in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. The Mozart Serenade in D major will be the second number on the program, which will open with Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony in C major. The present season has been, so far, the most s[illegible]essful the orchestra has ever given in [illegible] city.

From News
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 14 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America twenty-odd years ago but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 188[illegible] when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvelous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90's and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist, is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete program. The Symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful Scherzo which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire program early in the week.

---

delphia, Pa.
MAR 17 1914

ADEREWSKI SOLOIST FOR BOSTON PLAYERS

Shouts—actual shouts—greeted a decision by Ignace Paderewski to give just one more encore at the Academy of Music last night.

The audience of fashionables twice had expended ten-minute intervals in continuous applause, and when rewarded with its second encore a roar of approval went up that is rarely a concomitant of a concert.

And on the stage, with the lights turned out in the auditorium and only a dim funereal flicker back of him, sat the pianist with the greatest reputation in the world before his beloved instrument, pouring out his soul before a hushed, tense throng.

Following was the program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98 . . Brahms
  a. Allegro non troppo.
  b. Andante moderato.
  c. Allegro giocso.
  d. Allegro energico e passionato.
Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung ("Death and Transfiguration"), Op. 24 . . . . Strauss
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra . . . . Paderewski
Soloist—Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. Paderewski contributed a concerto that he penned himself. Unlike Liszt when he held forth as the world's foremost pianist, the subject of the present discourse has not become as famous as a composer as he has a keyboard magician. Decidedly not. But this is not saying that Paderewski cannot write impressive music; in fact, several of his pieces that are within the grasp of ordinary good players have attained quite a meed of popularity on the concert stage. But the Polish marvel early made a bid for fame as a writer of music, and by bringing forth a concerto teeming with exquisite imagery and nimble thoughts, stately chords stalking in impressive procession and technical brilliancy a-la-Paderewski-at-his-best, he became known as a promising composer as early as the eighties.

The pianist, despite a recent spell of illness, was in fine form. To describe his art is superfluous. To analyze his concerto has been done before. Suffice it to say that to the orchestra is given the basic themes for the most part, while beauteous embellishment and ornamentation constitute most of th piano solo. It is in three moveme nd probably its greatest weakne orchestration that is not up to th ndard of symphonic writers by an
. But, then, folks do not pa attention to orchestration wit ki at the piano.
phonic season is complete e of Strauss' music—and we it every year. It is being ed, too, as our ears are stomed to its peculiar
The Brahms sym-
ed in wonderfully ery interval of us line of coun-it seemed, be-that spells the s packed and scores

RLD
York City.
MAR 20 1914

ADEREWSKI
STON SYMPHONY

appearance in Carnegie light of the Boston Symphony ra, under Conductor Muck, in nection with Paderewski, as soloist, local music season put forth one of a best artistic endeavors. The auditorium was filled to the last bit of standing room.

Chadwick's symphony No. 3 opened the programme, the orchestra giving it a fine interpretation. "Samson," a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark, written last summer, had its first New York performance. It is, generally, a composition in the modern style abounding in odd harmonies and effective descriptive passages, the values of which the orchestra brought out in thrilling fashion. The audience drew an acknowledgment from the composer, who occupied a box.

Paderewski's interpretation of his own concerto in A minor was a brilliant piece of work, and aroused the audience to great enthusiasm. He subordinated himself and his piano to the orchestra and the whole composition was played with fine feeling and sincerity. As encores he played two Chopin numbers, a Nocturne and a Polonaise.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 21 1914

Some of the lucky 2,600 at to-day's Balaklava charge on the Boston Symphony farewell in Carnegie Hall were telling with almost unholy joy of a little incident that occurred Thursday night, when Paderewski had played, just as he was announced to do to-day. The artist's waiting room, back of the stage, is directly under some of the hundred odd studio apartments rented to local musicians in the upper parts of the hall. And while the famous pianist sat with Mme. Paderewski and his English manager, Ernest Sharpe, mentally going over the Polish dances of his piano concerto he was about to play with the orchestra, the silence was broken by strange sounds and rhythmic footsteps overhead. It soon became evident that there were at least two different dancing entertainments going on in the private studios.

Diplomacy was needed to stop that dancing. Whatever was done had to be done quickly. So Treasurer Joubert, who doesn't handle the money but just keeps the accounts, hastily located the parties and sized up the situation to Business Manager Brennan and his assistant, Mr. Spalding, thus: "They're ladies and gentlemen, all in evening dress, and they say they'll wait twenty minutes. We've got to do the handsome thing to keep 'em quiet. Will you stand for a case of champagne?"

Now those in charge of the hall, Rudolf Heck at the box office and Louis Salter at the stage door, had already taken to cyclone cellars, fearing a storm. But the urbane Charles Ellis, who's Paderewski's impresario as well as the Boston Symphony's chief philosopher and guide, handed out a $20 note and hustled Joubert over Seventh avenue to the Grenoble Hotel.

It was a sure-enough top-price article, and none of the just-as-good-as kinds, that the quick-witted aid brought back when he reappeared carrying an armful of bottles. And there wasn't a tango step heard above stairs till Paderewski left his dressing room for the stage, though there certainly was one chorus of suppressed screams when the recipients of this return courtesy heard that it was the classic Boston Symphony which rewarded their silence by "opening wine."

From PRESS
Address: New
Date MAR

PADEREWSKI AP
IN SYMPHONY C

Boston Organizatio
Reuben Goldmark's Latest Tone Poem.

A capacity crowd heard not only a manuscript novelty by Rubin Goldmark at the fifth and last Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, but had the remarkable experience of seeing Ignace Jan Paderewski play the piano in a brightly illuminated room.

Many of those who listened to the Polish poet of the keyboard—and his audience included a large number of distinguished musicians besides Felix Weingartner, who with his wife was a guest of Mrs. Samuel Untermyer; Josef Stransky, conductor of the Philharmonic Society; Kurtz Schindler, conductor of the Schola Cantorum, and members of the Flonzaley and Kneisel quartets—must have been greatly surprised that he gave under such perfectly normal conditions a really stirring performance of his youthful concerto in A minor, opus 17.

They had been led to believe that he could achieve impressive results only in the shadows of a mysteriously darkened auditorium.

It was late in the evening when Paderewski appeared on the stage, for his advent had been preceded by Goldmark's bulky tone-poem, "Samson," and by Chadwick's Symphony No. 3, in F major, which opened the programme. It was much later still when he answered the final applause, for the A minor concerto shows the pianist-composer in a communicative mood. Its pretty melodic ideas are spun out at considerable length. But folk were willing to stay and gaze upon Paderewski even when the music he was playing grew somewhat monotonous.

Rubin Goldmark, too, who sat in a first tier box and was compelled to rise and bow polite acknowledgment to the plaudits of his friends and admirers, has not compressed his musical thoughts into small compass. In the radiant altitudes of Colorado Springs and the idyllic sylvan seclusion of Keene Valley, in the Adirondack Mountains, he was able to take his time in giving symphonic delineation to the biblical subject which he has set forth in four movements, played without break, which bear the descriptions "Samson," "Delilah," "The Betrayal" and "In the Temple."

There are times when inspiration seems to run rather low and when the composition sounds somewhat labored, but the work as a whole is a dignified and interesting effort with an instrumental investiture that reveals unusual great originality of inven-

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

PADEREWSKI THRILLS AUDIENCE AT RECITAL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes Final Concert of Season at New National Theater.

SPLENDID PROGRAM IS GIVEN

The symphony concerts for this season closed yesterday afternoon with the last performance of a series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. Mr Paderewski was the solist, and from the appearance of the approaches to the National Theater at 4:30 o'clock, some State function might have attracted the throngs.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 4 opened the program.

Of the second number the 'Siegfried Idyl'' of Wagner, one of his few purely orchestral works, little need be said, except that it was written to commemorate the birth of his son, Seigfried, and that it is thematically considered a miniature reflection on the third book of "The Ring." The scoring is light, and the music throughout has the delicacy and fineness of texture of the string quartet.

The third number on the program was the "l'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas. This extremely dramatic piece was given here by the Philharmonic Orchestra about a month ago. It depicts the comical-tragic straits of the magician's apprentice, who in the absence of his master calls into being a power that soon waxes beyond his control. The music is inspired by a poem of Goethe. The subject is of that simple nature that lends itself easily to musical representation. Dukas has summoned the most widely diverse tonal imagery to his aid in making up his picture, which for the purely concrete is a match for Richard Strauss in his most daring moods. Dr. Muck gave a veracious-spirited rendering of the work.

The program closed with the piano concerto by Mr. Paderewski; the composer at the piano. The work is built on broad lines; the orchestra equally sharing with the piano in the interest of the performance. The series of brilliant climaxs of the first movement gathers strength and power to a most brilliant close. The Romanza affords Mr. Paderewski ample scope for the skilful handling of those soft dynamics with which he begins some of his most telling piano effects; also for the artful combined lingering and breathless hastening of his sublime passages. The last movement of this concerto is a triumph of brilliancy; and here as in parts of the first movement Mr. Paderewski made the piano in his powerful dynamics, almost a rival in volume of the orchestra itself.

Enthusiasm went mad, and when Mr. Paderewski came out finally after several recalls and sat down at the piano again, a cry of delight went up from the excited audience. Mr. Paderewski gave the Chopin Prelude No. 17, and without rising from the piano, went into the D flat Etude. Again he was recalled, and after sufficient insistence played the Schumann 'Nachtstuck No. 4.'' Altogether it was a great afternoon.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
MAR 2 1914

OLD COMPOSERS NOT DISTURBED

Last Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Was of a Sort Unique.

WAS CHADWICK AND GOLDMARK

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season yesterday night at Carnegie Hall. It was mostly in F minor, by Chadwick and Goldmark. It began with the symphonic lucubration of the Chadwick.

On the whole, I am inclined to think this is one of the most remarkable symphonies ever written. It is the only one of which it could justly be said that, with the addition of a few words, and the suppression of the more exalted and high-falutin' passages, it might be turned into a most successful comic opera. The dances are there already in appropriate triviality. Mr. Chadwick seems to have suspected this himself. He relieves the monotony of his lighter, lower and easier wingings, but ponderous imitations of the solemn, well-proportioned Parthenon style of Brahms, or of the solemn stateliness of Handel. Now he is lofty; now he is gay. Now he rises to the upper aether of the academician of Bemon Hill; now he sinks into the chaste sentimentalism of well-behaved feminine Brookline.

He is austere, and then relenting. He is intellectual, and then demagogic. Surely such music is irresistible, if only those accursed geniuses had not written better stuff. In another aspect, Mr. Chadwick's symphony had the fault to be found in th [illegible] pretentious nothing. It was without logic or interrelation. It wandered from style to style, from disconnected idea to disconnected idea, like the mind of a child, having no amalgam to bind into it persuasive coherency.

---

As far as rhetoric and reason were concerned, Rubin Goldmark's symphonic poem, "Samson," had much greater value. It was mediocre, but it was industriously elaborated and evidently the work of a serious student of composition. It followed the lines usual in a symphonic poem, lines so usual that they have become conventional. It was well received, and the composer bowed from his box. At the same time, Saint-Saens has exhausted Samson and ourselves—with the subject. But as Uncle Goldmark wrote a "Queen of Sheba," the nephew was forced also to be scriptural, out of pious loyalty.

M. Paderewski played his own concerto, amid customary plaudits. All dead composers were permitted last night to decompose in peace.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 191

The audience which filled the National Theater yesterday for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included Miss Margaret Wilson and a party of friends who occupied what has come to be known as the President's box, the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, who entertained Mrs. Norman Williams, Mme. Hague and Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Marshall, who was the guest of Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French Ambassador, Mrs. William Crozier and Mrs. Marshall Field, both entertaining box parties; the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Lane, the Secretary of Agriculture and Mrs. Houston, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Sheridan and the Misses Sheridan, Mrs. Henry C. Corbin, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Rufus Peckham, Mrs. Hughes, Miss Montgomery and Miss Margaretta Symons, Miss Jane Riggs, Miss Seibert, Mrs. James Parmelee, Miss Maury, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Douglas, Mrs. Harlan, Mrs. James S. Harlan, Mrs. Richard Ely, Mrs. Frances Warren, Miss Eloise Sargent, Mrs. Fremont-Smith, Mme. Calve, Miss Drain, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Thomas J. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Larcomb, Mrs. Benjamin H. Buckingham, Miss Freeman, Mr. George Eustis, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Isaac R. Hitt, Mrs. Huidekoper, the Misses Sedgely, Mrs. Edward Bonnafon, Miss Ida Thompson, Miss Katherine Hill, Mrs. William R. Smith, Mrs. Frank Noyes, Miss Noyes, Mrs. Clarence Wilson, Mrs. C. C. Glover and Miss Hagner.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 1 1914

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The fifth and last concert for this season in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given this evening at the Lyric. Paderewski will be the special feature of the concert, as he will not only be the soloist, but will play his own concerto, opus 17 in A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. The Mozart Serenade in D major will be the second number on the program, which will open with Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony in C major. The present season has been, so far, the most successful the orchestra has ever given in city.

From NEWS
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 14 1914

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The only opportunity Providence will have this year to hear that supreme artist, Paderewski, will be at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall, Tuesday evening, March 24. It was impossible for Mr. Ellis, his manager, to arrange for a recital here, and on that account he put him in as soloist with the Boston Symphony. In such capacity he plays with the orchestra in only a few cities, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Paderewski's art has never shown more brightly than it has this year. Now in the full maturity of his powers he not only has the lyric charm which made him unique when he first began to come to America twenty-odd years ago but he has also an heroic strain such as no pianist has had since Liszt. Saturday afternoon, March 7, he gave his fourth recital in Carnegie hall, New York, to the largest audience that hall has held in its history and that has been his experience everywhere this year, while critics have vied with each other in attempting to analyze the charm of his playing. Here he will play his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. Written in 1882 when he was studying in Vienna the year before he startled the world with his marvelous playing, he used it in many of his orchestral concerts in America during the '90's and in Europe it has remained a favorite work for pianists. It is very melodious and written by a pianist, is very grateful to the instrument.

Dr. Muck has not fully decided on his complete program. The Symphony, however, will in all likelihood be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F Minor. This is the first Tschaikowsky work Boston has had from Dr. Muck since his return. It is a work thoroughly Russian in character and is notable for its wonderful Scherzo which turns the string choir of the orchestra into a huge harp. It will be possible to announce the entire program early in the week.

IMES
delphia, Pa.
MAR 17 1914

ADEREWSKI SOLOIST FOR BOSTON PLAYERS

Shouts—actual shouts—greeted a decision by Ignace Paderewski to give just one more encore at the Academy of Music last night.

The audience of fashionables twice had expended ten-minute intervals in continuous applause, and when rewarded with its second encore a roar of approval went up that is rarely a concomitant of a concert.

And on the stage, with the lights turned out in the auditorium and only a dim funereal flicker back of him, sat the pianist with the greatest reputation in the world before his beloved instrument, pouring out his soul before a hushed, tense throng.

Following was the program:

Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98...Brahms
- a. Allegro non troppo.
- b. Andante moderato.
- c. Allegro giocso.
- d. Allegro energico e passionato.

Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung ("Death and Transfiguration"), Op. 24........Strauss
Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra ....Paderewski
Soloist—Mr. Paderewski.

Mr. Paderewski contributed a concerto that he penned himself. Unlike Liszt when he held forth as the world's foremost pianist, the subject of the present discourse has not become as famous as a composer as he has a keyboard magician. Decidedly not. But this is not saying that Paderewski cannot write impressive music; in fact, several of his pieces that are within the grasp of ordinary good players have attained quite a meed of popularity on the concert stage. But the Polish marvel early made a bid for fame as a writer of music, and by bringing forth a concerto teeming with exquisite imagery and nimble thoughts, stately chords stalking in impressive procession and technical brilliancy a-la-Paderewski-at-his-best, he became known as a promising composer as early as the eighties.

The pianist, despite a recent spell of illness, was in fine form. To describe his art is superfluous. To analyze his concerto has been done before. Suffice it to say that to the orchestra is given the basic themes for the most part, while beauteous embellishment and ornamentation constitute most of the piano solo. It is in three movements, and probably its greatest weakness is orchestration that is not up to the ndard of symphonic writers by any s. But, then, folks do not pay attention to orchestration with ski at the piano.

phonic season is complete e of Strauss' music—and we it every year. It is being ed, too, as our ears are ustomed to its peculiar The Brahms symted in wonderfully very interval of us line of counit seemed, be that spells the s packed and scores ay.

RLD
York City.
MAR 20 1914

ADEREWSKI
STON SYMPHONY

appearance in Carnegie night of the Boston Symphony tra, under Conductor Muck, in nection with Paderewski, as soloist, local music season put forth one of its best artistic endeavors. The auditorium was filled to the last bit of standing room.

Chadwick's symphony No. 3 opened the programme, the orchestra giving it a fine interpretation. "Samson," a tone poem by Rubin Goldmark, written last summer, had its first New York performance. It is, generally, a composition in the modern style abounding in odd harmonies and effective descriptive passages, the values of which the orchestra brought out in thrilling fashion. The audience drew an acknowledgment from the composer, who occupied a box.

Paderewski's interpretation of his own concerto in A minor was a brilliant piece of work, and aroused the audience to great enthusiasm. He subordinated himself and his piano to the orchestra and the whole composition was played with fine feeling and sincerity. As encores he played two Chopin numbers, a Nocturne and a Polonaise.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 17 1914

POLISH PIANIST AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Mr. Paderewski in His Own Concerto.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Paderewski as soloist was one of those occasions so complete in the program, the performance and in the public enthusiasm that it is surely destined to be long remembered.

There were in all only three numbers (of the listed program) rendered at the Academy last evening, and though none of the three compositions had been written thirty years ago, yet there was somehow the full dignity of a classical concert.

First came the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, that has so far lagged behind the others in popularity, and yet has a distinctive originality and, one may say, sincerity all its own. There is at the outset and throughout the charm of motio as of a first voyage or of a story of fai adventure, and this grows to a masterful momentum in the Scherzo and an irresistible drive in the Finale. The performance of the orchestra was far the best of the season. There was no striving to atone for the lack of suave color that is characteristic of Brahms, above all of the Fourth Symphony. But there was a fullness of abandon and of heroic spirit in the rhythms and the accent. The Andante is surely the most original of the slow movements of Brahms. The most meticulous critic could not find a trace of Beethoven in the strange Greek mode of the first theme, with the soothing answer in major. Highly poetic was the playing of the epilogue, with a fine breadth in the touch of "envoi." The greatest of all modern Scherzos was given with an unreined romp and revel of its elemental humor, which the famous Finale, in which Brahms embodied the ancient Passacaglia with its insistent, "obstinate" bass seemed a modern picture of the legend of Titans piling Ossa on Pelion.

A great piece of music may be interpreted in various ways without a loss of fidelity to the composer's intent. So the Strauss tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which has been heard so often in Philadelphia, even under the composer's own baton, was played last night with a peculiar graphic power. Strauss himself did bring out more clearly the throb of death-struggle, the resistless conquering stride and the triumphant victory.

In the second half of the concert the orchestra gave way to M. Paderewski as central figure in his own concerto, though even here they provided an accompaniment that he himself was gratefully eager to acknowledge. Despite the fact that Paderewski's concerto was written more than a quarter of a century ago, before the days of modern musical revolutions, it has lost none of its freshness of charm.

In the first movement one feels the blended tune and lilt that abound in the composer's opera "Manru" that it was hoped would be revived this year in America. In the second is the re vein that is fo

---

Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 18
Date

PADEREWSKI GETS OVATION.

Master Pianist Scores at Symphony Concert in Dual Role.

The thrill that attends a Paderewsl performance is surely that which com from touching greatness; it defies anal sis. The last concert of the season of t Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Ne National Theater yesterday afternoon w nessed, perhaps, one of the biggest ov tions that Washington has ever se When, after the Paderewski concerts with the great Paderewski as soloist, the pianist walked toward the piano to respond with an encore, the vast body of people, taxing the house to its capacity, gave forth a spontaneous shout. And not only one but three solos were played, making one feel he had gained a recital in connection with a symphony concert. Yet the orchestra alone, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave one of the most beautiful concerts of the season.

The symphony was the Tschaikowsky No. 4, F minor, and its spirit is distinctly Russian throughout. It is rhythmic and characteristic and seems to embody a struggle with fate against a defiant spirit of gaiety, and the latter was expressed in many moods which Dr. Muck worked out with the fineness and delicacy of a miniature painter. The illusive waltz of the first movement, and the andantino were full of grace. Nothing could be more charming than the scherzo, with its picking of all the strings developed and shaded with mastery, and the equally bright and lovely work of the winds. The vigor and sweep of the strings were contrasted strongly against a plaintive theme in the finale, it was decisive and triumphant both in spirit and in its excellent rendition.

The Paderewski concerto in A minor displays preeminently the art of the solo instrument. It abounds in incidents to show the skill of the pianist, and its interpretation in the hands of its creator was a wonderful experience. It is infused with the Polish spirit, opening with a typical theme developed by orchestra, then in strong contrast introducing the piano softly in a melodic and beautiful episode. Then the piano takes up the introductory theme vigorously, and it is elaborated with a manifold variety of pianistic effects, some marvelous runs and a brilliant climax. The "Romanza" gave all the tender beauty of tone and of spirit that seem to emanate from Paderewski as from no other player.

After a lovely rocking pianissimo, he developed a duet with the first violin admirably sustained by Mr. Witek, and brought out the rare orchestral effects that he alone can evoke from the piano. Masterful was the piano development of the allegro. It rushed on to a furious climax, the spirited kind of thing that finds the piano too limited. The piano soared through many intricacies up to a huge development. And then Mr. Paderewski played the Chopin "Prelude," No.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

AMERICAN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives Two-Thirds of His Programme Over to Local Composers.

It is evident that the American composer is not going to be abandoned. Two-thirds of the programme of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall was devoted to the works of American musicians, and the huge audience heard the band under Dr. Muck's direction give these works a performance that it would be difficult to equal.

The two compositions were Chadwick's Third Symphony and Rubin Goldmark's tone poem, "Samson," the second of which was composed last year and was receiving its first presentation in New York.

Mr. Chadwick's symphony has been heard before. It was written thirty years ago, at a time when, the composer himself has said, "It was not yet criminal to write a tune or insanity to resolve a discord." It is a modest, sincere, straightforward piece of music, which contains not a few genuine musical ideas, which are worked out pleasingly and never with a deviation from the path of beauty. If it is not a masterwork, it is at least a finely conceived and finely executed composition and one which should hold its place in the symphonic world, not because it is written by an American, but because it is worthy of that place.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" proved also worthy of a position on a Boston Symphony programme, and placed the composer a step ahead of anything he had accomplished before. It was programme music only in the broader sense, for it stood upon its own musical legs without any need of a Biblical prop. Its one great weakness was its length, its ideas being strung out when they had better have been condensed, with a consequent weakening of the force and unity of the structure. Yet, despite this, the ideas, the melodic invention, the originality of treatment, were there, and the composer showed himself a remarkable master of color and of orchestral effect. With some condensation "Samson" ought to prove one of the most remarkable pieces of serious music yet composed by an American. Mr. Goldmark is to be congratulated. Needless to say, Dr. Muck gave of the tone poem a worthy reading.

The assisting artist was Paderewski, o played his own interesting concerto A minor, with brilliancy of execution d richness of tone.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established:

FLORESTAN CLUB'S MUSICALE A DELIGHT

Noted Artists Of Boston Symphony Play One Of Strube's Compositions.

One of the most unique and delightful musical evenings ever given in Baltimore was the Field Night last evening at the Florestan Club. Through the courtesy of the Longy Club of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an enthusiastic audience of about 75 members of the Florestan Club were enabled to hear the greatest ensemble of wood wind players in the world in two new compositions.

The first number, naturally, has especial interest for the hearers, a recent composition by Gustave Strube of the Peabody Conservatory. It was a beautiful suite in four movements for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, magnificently performed by the superb artists of the Symphony Orchestra. This composition of Mr. Strube was recently given by the Longy Club in Boston with great success, as it had its first performance in the studio of Mr. Strube at the Peabody Conservatory of Music last month. It is a serious and melodious work, exceedingly difficult and requiring great virtuosity in the performers. The adagio is very beautiful and there is a light ad graceful scherzo movement which is exceedingly fascinating. The work displays a remarkable knowledge of the technique and fingering of the wind instruments for which it is written. One of the performers, in speaking of it afterward, remarked that he thought there was no composer living who knew as much about the orchestra instruments as Strube.

The second composition was a suite for two clarinets, two bassoons, flute and oboe, by Andre Maguarre, first flute of the Symphony. charming compositi erious in character on. in [145]

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
MAR 2
Date
Established:

PADEREWSKI PLAYS WITH DAZZLING EFFECT

His Own Concerto Feature of Boston Symphony Concert—Two American Composers Hear Own Compositions.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Paderewski was soloist last night at the closing evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, playing his own concerto in a programme that contained two numbers by American composers, George W. Chadwick and Rubin Goldmark, both of whom were present.

The Chadwick symphony was written twenty years ago, when form, clarity and melody counted for something. The third movement in saltarello form is especially pleasing in its rhythm, themes and clearly defined treatment of the orchestra. It is singularly free from mannerisms, and the orchestration is well done. It sounded fresh last evening and evoked several recalls for the conductor, who upon the third round invited the orchestra to acknowledge it.

Mr. Goldmark's contribution was a modern tone poem entitled "Samson," which had its first performance at the Boston symphony concerts last week in the orchestra's home city. After the composer had fairly launched his title role he seemed to have occupied himself more with Dalila, and from the entrance of the themes suggestive of the different phases of the well-known episode the work took on a more compact form than at the opening. It is full of melody and well harmonized, and the orchestration shows a complete understanding of the technical side, including a strong feeling for color. It is one of the most important contributions recently made to American literature and had an admirable performance at the hands of Dr. Muck. When the composer was discovered by his friends he was enthusiastically applauded.

Wonderful Color Given.

There was a new feature in Paderewski's playing when, to make it possible for the orchestra to read the accompaniment of his concerto, it was necessary to have the lights at their usual degree of illumination. The audience must have taken it as a promise that he would supplement his concerto with encores when the lights were lowered immediately after, notwithstanding the fact that it was the close of the programme, and he did, playing a Chopin mazurka and polonaise with his usual winsome charm in music of this sort.

His own concerto, too, which had been played recently by Katherine Goodson, was played with all the virtuosity at his command, and there were some wonderful color effects. The concerto seemed of a day gone by, written only with the view of being an effective work for a virtuoso with boundless technical equipment, which it is. The opening movement is by far the best writing of the three parts, although the second is a medium for sentimentality and the third for brilliant technical display. Paderewski was at his greatest heights in the position of interpreter, his playing being dazzling in dexterity and sweep. The orchestra under Dr. Muck gave an accompaniment which must have overjoyed the composer and interpreter.

Paderewski will again appear as soloist to-morrow afternoon, playing the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Edward Rechlin played for Mr. Dadmun.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

POLISH PIANIST AND BOSTON ORCHES

Brahms' Fourth Symphony Mr. Paderewski in His Ow Concerto.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Paderewski as soloist was one of those occasions so complete in the program, the performance and in the public enthusiasm that it is surely destined to be long remembered.

There were in all only three numbers (of the listed program) rendered at the Academy last evening, and though none of the three compositions had been written thirty years ago, yet there was somehow the full dignity of a classical concert.

First came the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, that has so far lagged behind the others in popularity, and yet has a distinctive originality and, one may say, sincerity all its own. There is at the outset and throughout the charm of motion as of a first voyage or of a story of fair adventure, and this grows to a masterful momentum in the Scherzo and an irresistible drive in the Finale. The performance of the orchestra was far the best of the season. There was no striving to atone for the lack of suave color that is characteristic of Brahms, above all of the Fourth Symphony. But there was a fullness of abandon and of heroic spirit in the rhythms and the accent. The Andante is surely the most original of the slow movements of Brahms. The most meticulous critic could not find a trace of Beethoven in the strange Greek mode of the first theme, with the soothing answer in major. Highly poetic was the playing of the epilogue, with a fine breadth in the touch of "envoi." The greatest of all modern Scherzos was given with an unreined romp and revel of its elemental humor, which the famous Finale, in which Brahms embodied the ancient Passacaglia with its insistent, "obstinate" bass seemed a modern picture of the legend of Titans piling Ossa on Pelion.

A great piece of music may be interpreted in various ways without a loss of fidelity to the composer's intent. So the Strauss tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which has been heard so often in Philadelphia, even under the composer's own baton, was played last night with a peculiar graphic power. Strauss himself did bring out more clearly the throb of death-struggle, the resistless conquering stride and the triumphant victory.

In the second half of the concert the orchestra gave way to M. Paderewski as central figure in his own concerto, though even here they provided an accompaniment that he himself was gratefully eager to acknowledge. Despite the fact that Paderewski's concerto was written more than a quarter of a century ago, before the days of modern musical revolutions, it has lost none of its freshness of charm.

In the first movement one feels the blended tune and lilt that abound in the composer's opera "Manru" that it was hoped would be revived this year in America. In the second is the reflective lyric vein that is found in other piano pieces of the composer, while the last returns to the rhythmic folk-dance of the beginning.

The enthusiasm of the audience rode roughly over the rule of encores and finally compelled the pianist to return to the instrument. After playing Rubinstein's Barcarole, when the audience still stayed and called for more, M. Paderewski added the sixth of the Hungarian Rhapsodies, perhaps the most difficult of this series of bravura pieces.

Leefson-Hille Concert

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

AMERICAN MUSIC BOSTON SYMPHO

Dr. Muck Gives Two-Thi His Programme Over to Local Composers.

It is evident that the American composer is not going to be abandoned. Two-thirds of the programme of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall was devoted to the works of American musicians, and the huge audience heard the band under Dr. Muck's direction give these works a performance that it would be difficult to equal.

The two compositions were Chadwick's Third Symphony and Rubin Goldmark's tone poem, "Samson," the second of which was composed last year and was receiving its first presentation in New York.

Mr. Chadwick's symphony has been heard before. It was written thirty years ago, at a time when, the composer himself has said, "It was not yet criminal to write a tune or insanity to resolve a discord." It is a modest, sincere, straightforward piece of music, which contains not a few genuine musical ideas, which are worked out pleasingly and never with a deviation from the path of beauty. If it is not a masterwork, it is at least a finely conceived and finely executed composition and one which should hold its place in the symphonic world, not because it is written by an American, but because it is worthy of that place.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" proved also worthy of a position on a Boston Symphony programme, and placed the composer a step ahead of anything he had accomplished before. It was programme music only in the broader sense, for it stood upon its own musical legs without any need of a Biblical prop. Its one great weakness was its length, its ideas being strung out when they had better have been condensed, with a consequent weakening of the force and unity of the structure. Yet, despite this, the ideas, the melodic invention, the originality of treatment, were there, and the composer showed himself a remarkable master of color and of orchestral effect. With some condensation "Samson" ought to prove one of the most remarkable pieces of serious music yet composed by an American. Mr. Goldmark is to be congratulated. Needless to say, Dr. Muck gave of the tone poem a worthy reading.

The assisting artist was Paderewski, who played his own interesting concerto in A minor, with brilliancy of execution and richness of tone.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date
Established:

PADEREWSKI LAYS WITH DAZZING EFFECT

His Own Concerto Feature of Boston Symphony Concert—Two American Composers Hear Own Compositions.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Paderewski was soloist last night at the closing evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, playing his own concerto in a programme that contained two numbers by American composers, George W. Chadwick and Rubin Goldmark, both of whom were present.

The Chadwick symphony was written twenty years ago, when form, clarity and melody counted for something. The third movement in saltarello form is especially pleasing in its rhythm, themes and clearly defined treatment of the orchestra. It is singularly free from mannerisms, and the orchestration is well done. It sounded fresh last evening and evoked several recalls for the conductor, who upon the third round invited the orchestra to acknowledge it.

Mr. Goldmark's contribution was a modern tone poem entitled "Samson," which had its first performance at the Boston symphony concerts last week in the orchestra's home city. After the composer had fairly launched his title role he seemed to have occupied himself more with Dalila, and from the entrance of the themes suggestive of the different phases of the well-known episode the work took on a more compact form than at the opening. It is full of melody and well harmonized, and the orchestration shows a complete understanding of the technical side, including a strong feeling for color. It is one of the most important contributions recently made to American literature and had an admirable performance at the hands of Dr. Muck. When the composer was discovered by his friends he was enthusiastically applauded.

Wonderful Color Given.

There was a new feature in Paderewski's playing when, to make it possible for the orchestra to read the accompaniment of his concerto, it was necessary to have the lights at their usual degree of illumination. The audience must have taken it as a promise that he would supplement his concerto with encores when the lights were lowered immediately after, notwithstanding the fact that it was the close of the programme, and he did, playing a Chopin mazurka and polonaise with his usual winsome charm in music of this sort.

His own concerto, too, which had been played recently by Katherine Goodson, was played with all the virtuosity at his command, and there were some wonderful color effects. The concerto seemed of a day gone by, written only with the view of being an effective work for a virtuoso with boundless technical equipment, which it is. The opening movement is by far the best writing of the three parts, although the second is a medium for sentimentality and the third for brilliant technical display. Paderewski was at his greatest heights in the position of interpreter, his playing being dazzling in dexterity and sweep. The orchestra under Dr. Muck gave an accompaniment which must have overjoyed the composer and interpreter.

Paderewski will again appear as soloist to-morrow afternoon, playing the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto.

Edward Rechlin played for Mr. Dadmun.

ING NEWS
altimore, Md.

FLORESTAN CLUB'S MUSICALE A DELIGHT

Noted Artists Of Boston Symphony Play One Of Strube's Compositions.

One of the most unique and delightful musical evenings ever given in Baltimore was the Field Night last evening at the Florestan Club. Through the courtesy of the Longy Club of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an enthusiastic audience of about 75 members of the Florestan Club were enabled to hear the greatest ensemble of wood wind players in the world in two new compositions.

The first number, naturally, has especial interest for the hearers, a recent composition by Gustave Strube of the Peabody Conservatory. It was a beautiful suite in four movements for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, magnificently performed by the superb artists of the Symphony Orchestra. This composition of Mr. Strube was recently given by the Longy Club in Boston with great success, as it had its first performance in the studio of Mr. Strube at the Peabody Conservatory of Music last month. It is a serious and melodious work, exceedingly difficult and requiring great virtuosity in the performers. The adagio is very beautiful and there is a light ad graceful scherzo movement which is exceedingly fascinating. The work displays a remarkable knowledge of the technique and fingering of the wind instruments for which it is written. One of the performers, in speaking of it afterward, remarked that he thought there was no composer living who knew as much about the orchestra instruments as Strube.

The second composition was a suite for two clarinets, two bassoons, flute and oboe, by Andre Maguarre, first flute of the Symphony. charming compositi erious in character on, in forth a spontan one but three solos were one feel he had gained a recital in nection with a symphony concert. Yet the orchestra alone, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave one of the most beautiful concerts of the season.

---

The symphony was the Tschaikowsky No. 4, F minor, and its spirit is distinctly Russian throughout. It is rhythmic and characteristic and seems to embody a struggle with fate against a defiant spirit of gaiety, and the latter was expressed in many moods which Dr. Muck worked out with the fineness and delicacy of a miniature painter. The illusive waltz of the first movement, and the andantino were full of grace. Nothing could be more charming than the scherzo, with its picking of all the strings developed and shaded with mastery, and the equally bright and lovely work of the winds. The vigor and sweep of the strings were contrasted strongly against a plaintive theme in the finale, it was decisive and triumphant both in spirit and in its excellent rendition.

The Paderewski concerto in A minor displays preeminently the art of the solo instrument. It abounds in incidents to show the skill of the pianist, and its interpretation in the hands of its creator was a wonderful experience. It is infused with the Polish spirit, opening with a typical theme developed by orchestra, then in strong contrast introducing the piano softly in a melodic and beautiful episode. Then the piano takes up the introductory theme vigorously, and it is elaborated with a manifold variety of pianistic effects, some marvelous runs and a brilliant climax. The "Romanza" gave all the tender beauty of tone and of spirit that seem to emanate from Paderewski as from no other player.

After a lovely rocking pianissimo, he developed a duet with the first violin admirably sustained by Mr. Witek, and brought out the rare orchestral effects that he alone can evoke from the piano. Masterful was the piano development of the allegro. It rushed on to a furious climax, the spirited kind of thing that finds the piano too limited. The piano soared through many intricacies up to a huge development. And then Mr. Paderewski played the Chopin "Prelude," No.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914
Esta 84

PADERÉWSKI IN BROOKLYN.

The Great Pianist Drew a Crowd of Standees to the Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming of Paderewski as the soloist for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night served to crowd the standing room at the back of the Academy of Music with people who would have been glad to buy seats if seats were to be had at a Boston Symphony concert. Paderewski not only drew this additional attendance but he completely satisfied the large audience by the almost uncanny beauty of his playing. His announced share of the programme was his own piano concerto, a work written with the utmost skill for the display of a wide variety of style in piano playing. At the close, in response to a great outburst of applause, he had the stage lights turned out and came on and played Schumann's "Nachtstuck" and the Chopin "Etude in E minor."

The great pianist looked like a nervous wreck when he took his seat and the vigor with which he pushed away an obtruding palm was an evidence of his unstrung condition. The anxiety with which he watched for the entrances of this most reliable of orchestras during the first movement of his concerto was fairly pitiable. If it had been anybody else one would have thought that he was on his way either from or to a sanitarium. But the man's extreme nervousness wore off during the second movement, in which the piano is especially prominent, and while he was actually playing he looked as nearly happy as a terribly worn man can be expected to look. It is well to state these things plainly, because so many people imagine that it is an easy thing to be a great pianist and that the reward is out of all proportion to the labor. In fact the maintenance of such a flawless technique as Paderewski commands, this season, requires the work of a dray horse from the body of a poet and it is small wonder if the artist's nerves are "worn to a frazzle"—to quote the most eminent of musical critics as well as the leader in many other fields of endeavor.

But if Paderewski's nerves are worn his command of his resources, last night, was as absolute as it has ever been before this public. Sometimes Paderewski has banged his piano like a blacksmith at an anvil, but there was not even a prefatory slam last night. The roundness and perfect clarity of his tones were wonderful and he ran the whole gamut of expression, or tone color. Tenderness is about the last quality one looks for in a piano concerto, but in the second movement Paderewski achieved it last night as fully as if he had been playing a Chopin nocturne with no orchestra in sight. The rapid chord passages in the last movement were a marvel of clearness also.

But the greatest effect came in the "Nachtstuck," the tenderness of which was simply exquisite. Perhaps a third of the audience had not expected an encore and were standing at the back when it came, yet the slightest noise, like the dropping of the traditional pin, would have been hissed, so eager was the attention to catch every last shade of delicate expression which the man drew from the steel strings. It came as near as any thing human can come to the sounds "which never were on sea or land." The Chopin Study was as beautifully played, but it does not call for inspired pianissimos and its effect was somewhat less, although the audience went home happy in the consciousness of having heard a great artist at his very best.

It was well that Paderewski played, because the orchestral programme was not of the sort to raise unusual entusiasm. The Symphony was Brahms' in E minor, which may be satisfying to the Brahms devotees but is for the most part cryptic to the ordinary concert goer. The slow movement to be sure has an appealing melody and there are attractive snatches of gayety in the scherzo, but the moments of charm were not frequent enough to rouse more than the most conventionally polite applause from an audience which feeds on symphonies. The other orchestral number, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, held the appeal which the symphony lacked and it was played with the delicacy and perfection of tone which makes the Boston Symphony the most perfect orchestra in the world.

The programme announced an increase of $1.50 a seat to subscribers for next season, but there is little chance of the subscription falling off on that account.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914
E 84

TELL SYMPHONY GROUP FAREWELL

Music World of New York Offers Parting Ovation to Great Boston Orchestra.

DR. MUCK'S FINE SELECTIONS

Works Performed Gave Fair View of Century's Best Musical Productions.

Very much music in New York yesterday, and practically the whole of the music world at Carnegie Hall to say farewell to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was "Orfeo ed Euridice" in the afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House, and "Lohengrin" in the evening. Kubelik violinized on Fifty-seventh street until 10.30 o'clock at night in aid of the Hungarian societies of New York, and Harold Bauer, at Aeolian Hall, gave further examples of his forceable style in piano playing.

There were three numbers on the Boston performance, the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, Mozart Serenade in D major, and Beethoven's Concerto No. 5, played by M. Paderewski. The opening of the symphony was not quite as neat in execution as it might have been, or as we have learned to expect from the Boston orchestra, but the pizzicato was so aptly done that Dr. Muck and his associates were exposed to a demonstration. Even the programme book, austere as it is, in its impartiality, ventured on a comparison between the length and the value of the rondo. M. Paderewski's version of the Beethoven Concerto had all the virtues long to be associated with his name.

Dr. Muck's Fine Programme.

The following is a list of works performed by Dr. Muck during the season just concluded:

D'Albert—"Hymn to Venus." Beethoven—Symphony in C major, No. 1, Op. 21; Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92. Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; "Tragic" Overture, Op. 81. Chadwick—Symphony in F major, No. 3. Cornelius—Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." Goldmark—Symphonic Poem, "Samson and Delilah." Haydn—Symphony in D major, No. 2. Humperdinck—"Es shauken die Winde." Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes." Mahler—Symphony in C-sharp minor, No. 5. Mozart—Symphony in E-flat (K. 543). Paderewski—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 17. Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye." R. Strauss—"Wiegenlied," "Caecilie." Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 35. Wagner—Overture, "The Flying Dutchman." Wolf—"Verborgenheit." Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67; Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major, No. 5; Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. Dvorak—Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67. Franck—Symphony in D minor; Smyphonic Poem, "Les Aeolides." Glazounoff—Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. Handel—Concerto in F major, for Strings and two Wind Orchestras. Haydn—Symphony in G major, No. 6. Liszt—"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem, No. 9. Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute"; "Haffner, Serenade, Nos. 2, 3, 4. Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34. Schmitt—"La Tragedie de Salome" (First time in New York). Smetana—Overture, "The Sold Bride." R. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung." Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Fair View of World's Music.

With all its omissions and commissions, this is a noteworthy list, affording us a fair view of the music of more than a century.

M. Gatti-Casazza's presentation of "Orfeo ed Euridice" is associated with many happy memories. It is one of the best performances given in the opera. The cast was that which we have known for five years, Louise Homer was Orfeo; Madame Gadski the Euridice, and M. Toscanini conducted the serenely beautiful music of Gluck for all its dramatic beauty and content.

"Lohengrin," with Madame Fremstad and Rudolf Berger, was heard in the evening.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914
E 1884

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski Again the Soloist—The Last Concert of Its Series.

Mr. Paderewski was again the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon before a crowded audience in Carnegie Hall. It was the orchestra's last concert in New York for this season, and it brought the series to a magnificent close. Mr. Paderewski played Beethoven's concerto in E flat. He has many times before played it in New York, but perhaps never with a more magical evocation of its manifold spirit of beauty than he did yesterday. It was a performance of infinite poetic charm, of power expressed through repose, of complete understanding and sympathy, and it was an interpretation in the higher sense that involved a recreation of all that the composer put into the music. Considerations of its technical brilliancy, its clarity, its marvelously subtle adjustment of dynamics, its rhythmic strength were lost sight of in the profoundly moving effect of the whole. The only cloud upon this occasion was a disparity between the pitch of the piano and of the orchestra, which at one point became acute.

The audience was stirred to much enthusiasm, and Mr. Pawderewski responded to its persistent applause by returning to play an arrangement of the "Liebestod," sung by Isolde in the final scene of "Tristan und Isolde," a song without words by Mendelssohn, Chopin's prelude in A flat, and one of his mazurkas.

The orchestra also rose to its most splendid achievement in the performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with which the concert opened, a performance of splendid sonority, and in the "pizzicato ostinato" of the scherzo taken at a very rapid pace, of wonderful precision and glittering brilliancy. In Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," three of whose eight movements were played, Mr. Witek, the concert master, gave an excellent performance of the violin solo. So much enthusiasm was aroused by the playing of Tschaikowsky's symphony that Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise to receive the applause for itself. It was altogether a notable ending o the Boston co[illegible] be no concerto until Paderewski had cut down the plants nearest [illegible] piano and toppled an immense clus[illegible] of daffodils into the orchestra-pit.

---

Such was the stirring climax of the season of Boston Symphony concerts. The Brahms concerto, which won only perfunctory applause, was performed with warmth and sincerity and a wonderful eloquence of tone. A passage for violas in the second number revealed a purity of voice that was a marvel even on a platfrom that during the week had supported El[illegible] and his violin. Even more moving was the Wagnerian "Siegfried Idyl" that followed. This number was performed last Sunday on the same stage by the Philharmonic orchestra under Stransky.

The series of concerts which closed last night was more remarkable in the high spots reached in separate concerts than in the standard of general excellence, which was in no way different from what has always been expected from the Bostonians. There were in the course of the five evenings several performances—such as, for instance, the Cesar Franck D minor symphony, the Liszt "Preludes," and the Mozart concerto for flute and harp with soloists from the [illegible] the orchestra—that are not likely ever to be forgotten by those who heard them. Especially true was this of the Mozartian masterpiece. And though there have been more [illegible] events of extraordinary [illegible] than in any previous [illegible] Boston orchestra at the close [illegible] retains its position of eminence [illegible] the forefront of all interpreters of the immortal classics.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS IMPROMPTU RECITAL

Performs on Darkened Stage After Close of Boston Symphony Concert.

HIS OWN CONCERTO HEARD.

Dr. Muck's Musicians End Season of Brilliancy.

Paderewski played an impromptu piano recital last evening in the gloaming of the darkened Academy of Music after the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts had come to a sensational close. Four times after the last and noisiest strains of his concerto had died away he was brought before the footlights to acknowledge the tumult. The fifth time he headed straight for the piano, out went the lights, and the Polish pianist played as if his heart and soul were in the programme that had been neither announced nor expected. A second time he was recalled and again he played. When the applause continued even after that, the curtain was rung down, leaving Brooklyn subscribers in their seats and Bostonian musicians on the stage still clamoring for more.

The first of these encores was Schumann's "Nachtstuck," a song-melody, simple but eloquent. It was followed by Chopin's F major etude, a splendid show-piece for Paderewski's grace and facility of touch.

The Paderewski concerto is said to have been played seven times within the past week by the composer-pianist and the splendid band under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. It contains snatches of Polish dance music and a fervent national hymn, together with Paderewskian trills and arpeggios and fireworks galore. Last night it stirred a phlegmatic audience that had taken for granted the beauties of one of the greatest of classic symphonies. Though not the most wonderful of works from the standpoint of pure music, of which the Boston symphonists are the most conspicuous exemplars, it is surely one of the most remarkable of feats when played by Paderewski himself. In one passage the pianist takes up a theme that has been started for him by the kettle-drum, providing points for those who would discuss whether Paderewski bangs too vigorously. Where the drums stopped and the piano began it would be difficult for a person with eyes closed to tell.

At the close of each third of the concerto Paderewski grasped the hand of Dr. Muck. When the finale had been reached he extended two hands to the brilliant conductor. At each recall there was a further embrace, and he extended similar greetings to Anton Witek, concert-master. The first appearance of the pianist on the platform was a sensation in itself. The usual banking [illegible]

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914

PADEREWSKI IN BROOKLYN.

The Great Pianist Drew a Crowd of Standees to the Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming of Paderewski as the soloist for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night served to crowd the standing room at the back of the Academy of Music with people who would have been glad to buy seats if seats were to be had at a Boston Symphony concert. Paderewski not only drew this additional attendance but he completely satisfied the large audience by the almost uncanny beauty of his playing. His announced share of the programme was his own piano concerto, a work written with the utmost skill for the display of a wide variety of style in piano playing. At the close, in response to a great outburst of applause, he had the stage lights turned out and came on and played Schumann's "Nachtstuck" and the Chopin "Etude in E minor."

The great pianist looked like a nervous wreck when he took his seat and the vigor with which he pushed away an obtruding palm was an evidence of his unstrung condition. The anxiety with which he watched for the entrances of this most reliable of orchestras during the first movement of his concerto was fairly pitiable. If it had been anybody else one would have thought that he was on his way either from or to a sanitarium. But the man's extreme nervousness wore off during the second movement, in which the piano is especially prominent, and while he was actually playing he looked as nearly happy as a terribly worn man can be expected to look. It is well to state these things plainly, because so many people imagine that it is an easy thing to be a great pianist and that the reward is out of all proportion to the labor. In fact the maintenance of such a flawless technique as Paderewski commands, this season, requires the work of a dray horse from the body of a poet and it is small wonder if the artist's nerves are "worn to a frazzle"—to quote the most eminent of musical critics as well as the leader in many other fields of endeavor.

But if Paderewski's nerves are worn his command of his resources, last night, was as absolute as it has ever been before this public. Sometimes Paderewski has banged his piano like a blacksmith at an anvil, but there was not even a prefatory slam last night. The roundness and perfect clarity of his tones were wonderful and he ran the whole gamut of expression, or tone color. Tenderness is about the last quality one looks for in a piano concerto, but in the second movement Paderewski achieved it last night as fully as if he had been playing a Chopin nocturne with no orchestra in sight. The rapid chord passages in the last movement were a marvel of clearness also.

But the greatest effect came in the "Nachtstuck," the tenderness of which was simply exquisite. Perhaps a third of the audience had not expected an encore and were standing at the back when it came, yet the slightest noise, like the dropping of the traditional pin, would have been hissed, so eager was the attention to catch every last shade of delicate expression which the man drew from the steel strings. It came as near as any thing human can come to the sounds "which never were on sea or land." The Chopin Study was as beautifully played, but it does not call for inspired pianissimos and its effect was somewhat less, although the audience went home happy in the consciousness of having heard a great artist at his very best.

It was well that Paderewski played, because the orchestral programme was not of the sort to raise unusual entusiasm. The Symphony was Brahms' in E minor, which may be satisfying to the Brahms devotees but is for the most part cryptic to the ordinary concert goer. The slow movement to be sure has an appealing melody and there are attractive snatches of gayety in the scherzo, but the moments of charm were not frequent enough to rouse more than the most conventionally polite applause from an audience which feeds on symphonies. The other orchestral number, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, held the appeal which the symphony lacked and it was played with the delicacy and perfection of tone which makes the Boston Symphony the most perfect orchestra in the world.

The programme announced an increase of $1.50 a seat to subscribers for next season, but there is little chance of the subscription falling off on that account.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914

TELL SYMPHONY GROUP FAREWELL

Music World of New York Offers Parting Ovation to Great Boston Orchestra.

DR. MUCK'S FINE SELECTIONS

Works Performed Gave Fair View of Century's Best Musical Productions.

Very much music in New York yesterday, and practically the whole of the music world at Carnegie Hall to say farewell to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was "Orfeo ed Euridice" in the afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House, and "Lohengrin" in the evening. Kubelik violinized on Fifty-seventh street until 10.30 o'clock at night in aid of the Hungarian societies of New York, and Harold Bauer, at Aeolian Hall, gave further examples of his forceable style in piano playing.

There were three numbers on the Boston performance; the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, Mozart Serenade in D major, and Beethoven's Concerto No. 5, played by M. Paderewski. The opening of the symphony was not quite as neat in execution as it might have been, or as we have learned to expect from the Boston orchestra, but the pizzicato was so aptly done that Dr. Muck and his associates were exposed to a demonstration. Even the programme book, austere as it is, in its impartiality, ventured on a comparison between the length and the value of the rondo. M. Paderewski's version of the Beethoven Concerto had all the virtues long to be associated with his name.

Dr. Muck's Fine Programme.

The following is a list of works performed by Dr. Muck during the season just concluded:

D'Albert—"Hymn to Venus." Beethoven—Symphony in C major, No. 1, Op. 21; Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92. Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; "Tragic" Overture, Op. 81. Chadwick—Symphony in F major, No. 3. Cornelius—Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." Goldmark—Symphonic Poem, "Samson and Delilah." Haydn—Symphony in D major, No. 2. Humperdinck—"Es shauken die Winde." Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes." Mahler—Symphony in C-sharp minor, No. 5. Mozart—Symphony in E-flat (K. 543). Paderewski—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 17. Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye." R. Strauss—"Wiegenlied," "Caecilie." Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 35. Wagner—Overture, "The Flying Dutchman." Wolf — "Verborgenheit." Beethoven — Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67; Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major, No. 5; Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. Dvorak—Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67. Franck—Symphony in D minor; Smyphonic Poem, "Les Aeolides." Glazounoff—Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. Handel—Concerto in F major, for Strings and two Wind Orchestras. Haydn—Symphony in G major, No. 6. Liszt—"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem, No. 9. Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute"; "Haffner, Serenade, Nos. 2, 3, 4. Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34. Schmitt—"La Tragedie de Salome" (First time in New York). Smetana—Overture, "The Sold Bride." R. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung." Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Fair View of World's Music.

With all its omissions and commissions, this is a noteworthy list, affording us a fair view of the music of more than a century.

M. Gatti-Casazza's presentation of "Orfeo ed Euridice" is associateed with many happy memories. It is one of the best performances given in the opera. The cast was that which we have known for five years, Louise Homer was Orfeo; Madame Gadski the Euridice, and M. Toscanini conducted the serenely beautiful music of Gluck for all its dramatic beauty and content.

"Lohengrin," with Madame Fremstad and Rudolf Berger, was heard in the evening.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski Again the Soloist—The Last Concert of Its Series.

Mr. Paderewski was again the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon before a crowded audience in Carnegie Hall. It was the orchestra's last concert in New York for this season, and it brought the series to a magnificent close. Mr. Paderewski played Beethoven's concerto in E flat. He has many times before played it in New York, but perhaps never with a more magical evocation of its manifold spirit of beauty than he did yesterday. It was a performance of infinite poetic charm, of power expressed through repose, of complete understanding and sympathy, and it was an interpretation in the higher sense that involved a recreation of all that the composer put into the music. Considerations of its technical brilliancy, its clarity, its marvelously subtle adjustment of dynamics, its rhythmic strength were lost sight of in the profoundly moving effect of the whole. The only cloud upon this occasion was a disparity between the pitch of the piano and of the orchestra, which at one point became acute.

The audience was stirred to much enthusiasm, and Mr. Pawderewski responded to its persistent applause by returning to play an arrangement of the "Liebestod," sung by Isolde in the final scene of "Tristan und Isolde," a song without words by Mendelssohn, Chopin's prelude in A flat, and one of his mazurkas.

The orchestra also rose to its most splendid achievement in the performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with which the concert opened, a performance of splendid sonority, and in the "pizzicato ostinato" of the scherzo, taken at a very rapid pace, of wonderful precision and glittering brilliancy. In Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," three of whose eight movements were played, Mr. Witek, the concert master, gave an excellent performance of the violin solo. So much enthusiasm was aroused by the playing of Tschaikowsky's symphony that Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise to receive the applause for itself. It was altogether a notable ending of the Boston orche could be no concerto until Paderewski had cut down the plants nearest the piano and toppled an immense cluster of daffodils into the orchestra-pit.

---

Such was the stirring climax of the season of Boston Symphony concerts. The Brahms concerto, which won only perfunctory applause, was performed with warmth and sincerity and a wonderful eloquence of tone. A passage for violas in the second number revealed a purity of voice that was a marvel even on a platfrom that during the week had supported Elman and his violin. Even more moving was the Wagnerian "Siegfried Idyl" that followed. This number was performed last Sunday on the same stage by the Philharmonic orchestra under Stransky.

The series of concerts which closed last night was more remarkable in the high spots reached in separate concerts than in the standard of general excellence, which was in no way different from what has always been expected from the Bostonians. There were in the course of the five evenings several performances—such as, for instance, the Cesar Franck D minor symphony, the Liszt "Preludes" and the Mozart concerto for flute and harp with soloists from the ranks of the orchestra—that are not likely ever to be forgotten by those who heard them. Especially true was this of the Mozartian masterpiece. And though there have been more orchestral events of extraordinary merit here than in any previous season, the Boston orchestra at the close of it still retains its position of eminence at the forefront of all interpreters of the immortal classics.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS IMPROMPTU RECITAL

Performs on Darkened Stage After Close of Boston Symphony Concert.

HIS OWN CONCERTO HEARD.

Dr. Muck's Musicians End Season of Brilliancy.

Paderewski played an impromptu piano recital last evening in the gloaming of the darkened Academy of Music after the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts had come to a sensational close. Four times after the last and noisiest strains of his concerto had died away he was brought before the footlights to acknowledge the tumult. The fifth time he headed straight for the piano, out went the lights, and the Polish pianist played as if his heart and soul were in the programme that had been neither announced nor expected. A second time he was recalled and again he played. When the applause continued even after that, the curtain was rung down, leaving Brooklyn subscribers in their seats and Bostonian musicians on the stage still clamoring for more.

The first of these encores was Schumann's "Nachtstuck," a song-melody, simple but eloquent. It was followed by Chopin's F major etude, a splendid show-piece for Paderewski's grace and facility of touch.

The Paderewski concerto is said to have been played seven times within the past week by the composer-pianist and the splendid band under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. It contains snatches of Polish dance music and a fervent national hymn, together with Paderewskian trills and arpeggios and fireworks galore. Last night it stirred a phlegmatic audience that had taken for granted the beauties of one of the greatest of classic symphonies. Though not the most wonderful of works from the standpoint of pure music, of which the Boston symphonists are the most conspicuous exemplars, it is surely one of the most remarkable of feats when played by Paderewski himself. In one passage the pianist takes up a theme that has been started for him by the kettle-drum, providing points for those who would discuss whether Paderewski bangs too vigorously. Where the drums stopped and the piano began it would be difficult for a person with eyes closed to tell.

At the close of each third of the concerto Paderewski grasped the hand of Dr. Muck. When the finale had been reached he extended two hands to the brilliant conductor. At each recall there was a further embrace, and he extended similar greetings to Anton Witek, concert-master. The first appearance of the pianist on the platform was a sensation in itself.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914

PADERESWKI IN BROOKLYN.

The Great Pianist Drew a Crowd of Standees to the Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming of Paderewski as the soloist for the closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night served to crowd the standing room at the back of the Academy of Music with people who would have been glad to buy seats if seats were to be had at a Boston Symphony concert. Paderewski not only drew this additional attendance but he completely satisfied the large audience by the almost uncanny beauty of his playing. His announced share of the programme was his own piano concerto, a work written with the utmost skill for the display of a wide variety of style in piano playing. At the close, in response to a great outburst of applause, he had the stage lights turned out and came on and played Schumann's "Nachtstuck" and the Chopin "Etude in E minor."

The great pianist looked like a nervous wreck when he took his seat and the vigor with which he pushed away an obtruding palm was an evidence of his unstrung condition. The anxiety with which he watched for the entrances of this most reliable of orchestras during the first movement of his concerto was fairly pitiable. If it had been anybody else one would have thought that he was on his way either from or to a sanitarium. But the man's extreme nervousness wore off during the second movement, in which the piano is especially prominent, and while he was actually playing he looked as nearly happy as a terribly worn man can be expected to look. It is well to state these things plainly, because so many people imagine that it is an easy thing to be a great pianist and that the reward is out of all proportion to the labor. In fact the maintenance of such a flawless technique as Paderewski commands, this season, requires the work of a dray horse from the body of a poet and it is small wonder if the artist's nerves are "worn to a frazzle"—to quote the most eminent of musical critics as well as the leader in many other fields of endeavor.

But if Paderewski's nerves are worn his command of his resources, last night, was as absolute as it has ever been before this public. Sometimes Paderewski has banged his piano like a blacksmith at an anvil, but there was not even a prefatory slam last night. The roundness and perfect clarity of his tones were wonderful and he ran the whole gamut of expression, or tone color. Tenderness is about the last quality one looks for in a piano concerto, but in the second movement Paderewski achieved it last night as fully as if he had been playing a Chopin nocturne with no orchestra in sight. The rapid chord passages in the last movement were a marvel of clearness also.

But the greatest effect came in the "Nachtstuck," the tenderness of which was simply exquisite. Perhaps a third of the audience had not expected an encore and were standing at the back when it came, yet the slightest noise, like the dropping of the traditional pin, would have been hissed, so eager was the attention to catch every last shade of delicate expression which the man drew from the steel strings. It came as near as any thing human can come to the sounds "which never were on sea or land." The Chopin Study was as beautifully played, but it does not call for inspired pianissimos and its effect was somewhat less, although the audience went home happy in the consciousness of having heard a great artist at his very best.

It was well that Paderewski played, because the orchestral programme was not of the sort to raise unusual entusiasm. The Symphony was Brahms' in E minor, which may be satisfying to the Brahms devotees but is for the most part cryptic to the ordinary concert goer. The slow movement to be sure has an appealing melody and there are attractive snatches of gayety in the scherzo, but the moments of charm were not frequent enough to rouse more than the most conventionally polite applause from an audience which feeds on symphonies. The other orchestral number, the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner, held the appeal which the symphony lacked and it was played with the delicacy and perfection of tone which makes the Boston Symphony the most perfect orchestra in the world.

The programme announced an increase of $1.50 a seat to subscribers for next season, but there is little chance of the subscription falling off on that account.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914

TELL SYMPHONY GROUP FAREWELL

Music World of New York Offers Parting Ovation to Great Boston Orchestra.

DR. MUCK'S FINE SELECTIONS

Works Performed Gave Fair View of Century's Best Musical Productions.

Very much music in New York yesterday, and practically the whole of the music world at Carnegie Hall to say farewell to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was "Orfeo ed Euridice" in the afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House, and "Lohengrin" in the evening. Kubelik violinized on Fifty-seventh street until 10.30 o'clock at night in aid of the Hungarian societies of New York, and Harold Bauer, at Aeolian Hall, gave further examples of his forceable style in piano playing.

There were three numbers on the Boston performance; the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, Mozart Serenade in D major, and Beethoven's Concerto No. 5, played by M. Paderewski. The opening of the symphony was not quite as neat in execution as it might have been, or as we have learned to expect from the Boston orchestra, but the pizzicato was so aptly done that Dr. Muck and his associates were exposed to a demonstration. Even the programme book, austere as it is, in its impartiality, ventured on a comparison between the length and the value of the rondo. M. Paderewski's version of the Beethoven Concerto had all the virtues long to be associated with his name.

Dr. Muck's Fine Programme.

The following is a list of works performed by Dr. Muck during the season just concluded:

D'Albert—"Hymn to Venus." Beethoven—Symphony in C major, No. 1, Op. 21; Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92. Brahms—Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98; "Tragic" Overture. Op. 81. Chadwick—Symphony in F major, No. 3. Cornelius—Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad." Goldmark—Symphonic Poem, "Samson and Delilah." Haydn—Symphony in D major, No. 2. Humperdinck—"Es shauken die Winde." Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes." Mahler—Symphony in C-sharp minor, No. 5. Mozart—Symphony in E-flat (K. 543). Paderewski—Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 17. Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye." R. Strauss—"Wiegenlied," "Caecilie." Tschaikowsky—Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 35. Wagner—Overture, "The Flying Dutchman." Wolf — "Verborgenheit." Beethoven — Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67; Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major, No. 5; Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. Dvorak—Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Op. 67. Franck—Symphony in D minor; Smyphonic Poem, "Les Aeolides." Glazounoff—Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. Handel—Concerto in F major, for Strings and two Wind Orchestras. Haydn—Symphony in G major, No. 6. Liszt—"Hungaria," Symphonic Poem, No. 9. Mozart—Overture to "The Magic Flute"; "Haffner, Serenade, Nos. 2, 3, 4. Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34. Schmitt—"La Tragedie de Salome" (First time in New York). Smetana—Overture, "The Sold Bride." R. Strauss—Tone Poem, "Tod und Verklarung." Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Fair View of World's Music.

With all its omissions and commissions, this is a noteworthy list, affording us a fair view of the music of more than a century.

M. Gatti-Casazza's presentation of "Orfeo ed Euridice" is associateed with many happy memories. It is one of the best performances given in the opera. The cast was that which we have known for five years, Louise Homer was Orfeo; Madame Gadski the Euridice, and M. Toscanini conducted the serenely beautiful music of Gluck for all its dramatic beauty and content.

"Lohengrin," with Madame Fremstad and Rudolf Berger, was heard in the evening.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski Again the Soloist—The Last Concert of its Series.

Mr. Paderewski was again the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took [illegible] yesterday afternoon before a crowded audience in Carnegie Hall. It was the orchestra's last concert in New York for this season, and it brought the series to a magnificent close. Mr. Paderewski played Beethoven's concerto in E flat. He has many times before played it in New York, but perhaps never with a more magical evocation of its manifold spirit of beauty than he did yesterday. It was a performance of infinite poetic charm, of power expressed through repose, of complete understanding and sympathy, and it was an interpretation in the higher sense that involved a recreation of all that the composer put into the music. Considerations of its technical brilliancy, its clarity, its marvelously subtle adjustment of dynamics, its rhythmic strength were lost sight of in the profoundly moving effect of the whole. The only cloud upon this occasion was a disparity between the pitch of the piano and of the orchestra, which at one point became acute.

The audience was stirred to much enthusiasm, and Mr. Pawderewski responded to its persistent applause b returning to play an arrangement of th "Liebestod," sung by Isolde in th final scene of "Tristan und Isolde," song without words by Mendelssohn Chopin's prelude in A flat, and one o his mazurkas.

The orchestra also rose to its mos splendid achievement in the performance of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with which the concert opened a performance of splendid sonority, and in the "pizzicato ostinato" of the scherzo taken at a very rapid pace, of wonderfu precision and glittering brilliancy. I Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," three o whose eight movements were played, Mr Witek, the concert master, gave an excellent performance of the violin solo So much enthusiasm was aroused b the playing of Tschaikowsky's symphony that Dr. Muck had the orchestr rise to receive the applause for itsel It was altogether a notable ending o the Boston could be no concerto until Paderewsk had cut down the plants nearest th piano and toppled an immense cluste of daffodils into the orchestra-pit.

---

Such was the stirring climax of the season of Boston Symphony concerts. The Brahms concerto, which won only perfunctory applause, was performed with warmth and sincerity and a wonderful eloquence of tone. A passage for violas in the second number revealed a purity of voice that was a marvel even on a platfrom that during the week had supported Elman and his violin. Even more moving was the Wagnerian "Siegfried Idyl" that followed. This number was performed last Sunday on the same stage by the Philharmonic orchestra under Stransky.

The series of concerts which closed last night was more remarkable in the high spots reached in separate concerts than in the standard of general excellence, which was in no way different from what has always been expected from the Bostonians. There were in the course of the five evenings several performances—such as, for instance, the Cesar Franck D minor symphony, the Liszt "Preludes" and the Mozart concerto for flute and harp with soloists from the ranks of the orchestra—that are not likely ever to be forgotten by those who heard them. Especially true was this of the Mozartian masterpiece. And though there have been more orchestral events of extraordinary [illegible] than in any previous season, the Boston orchestra at the close of its [illegible] retains its position of eminence in the forefront of all interpreters of the immortal classics.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 21 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS IMPROMPTU RECITAL

Performs on Darkened Stage After Close of Boston Symphony Concert.

HIS OWN CONCERTO HEARD.

Dr. Muck's Musicians End Season of Brilliancy.

Paderewski played an impromptu piano recital last evening in the gloaming of the darkened Academy of Music after the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts had come to a sensational close. Four times after the last and noisiest strains of his concerto had died away he was brought before the footlights to acknowledge the tumult. The fifth time he headed straight for the piano, out went the lights, and the Polish pianist played as if his heart and soul were in the programme that had been neither announced nor expected. A second time he was recalled and again he played. When the applause continued even after that, the curtain was rung down, leaving Brooklyn subscribers in their seats and Bostonian musicians on the stage still clamoring for more.

The first of these encores was Schumann's "Nachtstuck," a song-melody, simple but eloquent. It was followed by Chopin's F major etude, a splendid show-piece for Paderewski's grace and facility of touch.

The Paderewski concerto is said to have been played seven times within the past week by the composer-pianist and the splendid band under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck. It contains snatches of Polish dance music and a fervent national hymn, together with Paderewskian trills and arpeggios and fireworks galore. Last night it stirred a phlegmatic audience that had taken for granted the beauties of one of the greatest of classic symphonies. Though not the most wonderful of works from the standpoint of pure music, of which the Boston symphonists are the most conspicuous exemplars, it is surely one of the most remarkable of feats when played by Paderewski himself. In one passage the pianist takes up a theme that has been started for him by the kettle-drum, providing points for those who would discuss whether Paderewski bangs too vigorously. Where the drums stopped and the piano began it would be difficult for a person with eyes closed to tell.

At the close of each third of the concerto Paderewski grasped the hand of Dr. Muck. When the finale had been reached he extended two hands to the brilliant conductor. At each recall there was a further embrace, and he extended similar greetings to Anton Witek, concert-master. The first appearance of the pianist on the platform was a sensation in itself.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 1914

Paderewski and Boston Symphony Please Many

The appearance of either Paderewski or the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a welcome musical event in Washington, and the combination of the two served to crowd the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 4, opened the program, and the playing of that demonstrated that the orchestra was to render a program in its usual finished and polished fashion. Dr. Karl Muck conducted.

The dramatic "l'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, gave musical patrons of both the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphonies a chance to compare interpretations, for the former organization played the piece here a month ago.

The playing of Paderewski aroused [illegible] enthusiasm.

Estab 1884

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski as Soloist Plays His Own Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its fifth visit to New York, the last of the season, devoted its concert last evening to works of three living composers, all of whom were present in the hall. George W. Chadwick's symphony in F, No. 3; Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson," and Ignace Paderewski's concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra were the works presented; and Mr. Paderewski played the pianoforte part in his concerto.

The two American compositions did honor to American art, and the audience was enthusiastic in its applause of both of them. Mr. Chadwick's symphony is twenty years old and more. It won a prize offered by the National Conservatory of New York in 1894, but it has had a more fortunate career than many prize compositions, which are often not heard a second time. It is dedicated to Theodore Thomas, and he played it not once but several times, and the Boston Orchestra has played it before. It has been said of this symphony that it was composed at a time when the writing of melody was not considered necessarily the proof of a sterile mind, nor the resolution of discords an indication of imbecility.

Mr. Chadwick's symphony is not deficient in frank melody, often of a distinguished sort and his harmonic treatment is rich and expressive, even though it has few of the significant features that are considered "modern" to-day. The music is strong, vigorous, manly, without affectation, both in the themes and in the development through which they are put, and this development is not only lucid and logical, but it is also finely and artistically conceived, musically beautiful. Mr. Chadwick's use of the orchestra is skillful, giving color and euphony. The symphony dates from the time when Dr. Dvorak was urging "Americanism" upon American composers, and whether or not that was the influence there are a few suggestions of a turn of melody that might be considered to be derived from the folk song of the negroes. At all events this symphony may be considered and prized as truly American music.

Mr. Goldmark, in his symphonic poem "Samson," on the other hand, has deliberately chosen an esoteric subject, and has devoted his resources to representing the emotional and dramatic aspects of the Old Testament narrative, and, at the end, to some suggestion of the demolition of the Temple. But this delineation is hardly more than suggested, and Mr. Goldmark has done wisely in keeping to the field that music more rightfully claims as its own. The piece is in one movement, but there are four divisions, intended to portray Samson, Delilah, the betrayal, and the end in the Temple. The general impression is of somewhat too great length, and an insufficient differentiation and contrast of the musical substance.

There is, in fact, something of monotony. Yet there is much that is noble, dignified, impassioned, and exalted in Mr. Goldmark's music; finely expressive themes, stirring development of them, and an especially fine skill in the orchestral treatment, which is warmly, at times gorgeously, colored. There is little or no attempt to produce an Oriental atmosphere; but the mood of passion, of despair, of tragedy, is little lightened and ends by becoming oppressive. It was the first performance in New York of Mr. Goldmark's composition, which is still in manuscript; an admirable performance, as was that of Mr. Chadwick's symphony.

Mr. Paderewski's concerto, after a long rest, had been heard in New York a few weeks ago from Miss Katharine Goodson. The composer played it with inimitable brilliancy, power, and bravura, with elegiac tenderness and poetry in the passages of cantilena.

The music has vitality, though the composer did not forget when he wrote it that one of the purposes of a concerto is display. In the last movement, indeed, he gave this a preponderating rôle. Yet even in the most dazzling pages of this music there is something more than mere glitter; there is a substance beneath it, and this Mr. Paderewski raised to its highest power.

Estab 94

From HERALD
Address: New York
Dat MAR 22 1914

Audience Cheers as Paderewski Plays Encores

Eminent Polish Pianist Breaks No Encore Rule of Boston Symphony, to Delight of His Hearers.

When Paderewski started to break the "no encore" rule at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall a roar of delight went up from about three thousand throats. It could have been heard a block. It was the season's final concert of the orchestra, and it is doubtful if Carnegie Hall ever housed a larger audience. Hundreds were turned away after every available inch of standing room was filled.

The early part of the programme was sedate enough, Dr. Muck conducting his famous virtuosi orchestra in a most brilliant performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony—the third movement of which was so exquisitely played that the audience made the players rise and then bombarded them with applause. Then came three movements from Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," which sounded comparatively dull and in which Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, did not distinguish himself by his solo work.

Now came the lodestone of the concert, Mr. Paderewski's playing of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. But the Polish pianist was tardy in making his appearance. After a wait of several minutes Dr. Muck started back to find out what the trouble was. He reappeared soon, followed by Paderewski, who was greeted with applause, which was as tame as a murmur compared to the later demonstration. He really played in a masterly manner, indulging in no "pounding," but charging the slow movement of the work with compelling beauty of tone and sentiment, while the final rondo was marked by infectuous spirit and virility. It was a beautiful performance, and Dr. Muck conducted a superb accompaniment.

Then the orchestra members snatched their instruments, feeling the call of Boston, and hurried away, while the lights were dimmed and the audience roared as Mr. Paderewski sat down and played the opening bars of the Wagner-Liszt "Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde," following it with other encores until the audience had applauded its palms sore.

So the staid Boston Symphony concerts had one of its inviolable rules of "no encores" broken, but then "a king can do no wrong." The management condoned it and the huge audience revelled in it.

stal 4

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 22 1914

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES LAST MATINEE

Mr. Paderewski's Reading of Beethoven Music Arouses Great Enthusiasm.

WITEK IS VIOLIN SOLOIST

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade Please.

, 1884

The last matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The audience was one of great size, and its enthusiasm was aroused more than once in the course of the entertainment. The programme comprised Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Mozart's "Haffner" serenade and Beethoven's E flat piano concerto. The pianist, as on Thursday evening, was Mr. Paderewski.

The arrangement of the programme was not ideal, but since it was apparently the aim to save the famous pianist for the finale, the Mozart composition, written to celebrate the marriage of Elizabeth Haffner, daughter of the burgomaster of Salzburg, served well to bridge the chasm of style between the symphony and the concerto. The solo violin part in the serenade was generally well played by Concertmeister Anton Witek, who brought to it some good qualities of tone and the crispness of technic demanded by its character.

The concert thus became one continuous exhibition of virtuosity, for the orchestral performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony was something to be cherished in the memory. It was an extraordinary achievement in technical brilliancy and finish. Every [illegible] with opulence [illegible] and with exquisitely adjusted nuance, while in the larger effects the splendor of the sonorous proclamations was paired with the perfection of balance and the unceasing preservation of clarity. The pizzicato ostinato, that dazzling piece of orchestral staccato, was taken at a tremendous tempo and carried through with amazing accuracy of phraseology and gradation of accent. This movement called forth a storm of applause, and Dr. Muck had to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment of it.

After the quieting delivery of the clear and sunny music of Mozart, the mind was ready for the broad and dignified interpretation of the noble "Emperor" concerto. The virtuosity displayed here by Mr. Paderewski was of the higher type, that which unites adequacy of technic with fitness of style. The concerto, as all music lovers know, does not require the most brilliant effects of modern piano playing, but demands large musical appreciation and the ability to make the piano sing in the grand manner. Mr. Paderewski played the concerto like a master, with largeness of conception and loftiness of style, and his almost amazing command of the secrets of cantilena was displayed in the proper places in its full beauty. It was unfortunate that there was a slight difference in pitch between piano and orchestra.

The audience was insistent that the soloist should add something to the programme. Purists naturally regret to see audiences make such demands and still more to see famous artists yield to them. After the "Emperor" concerto what? If we were all artists we would answer silence and recollections. But since we are not, perhaps we must extenuate Mr. Paderewski's consenting to play encores. Yet again some will wish that he had played a piece of real piano music and not Liszt's transcription of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 22 1914

Boſton Symphony Orcheſter. — Paderewsky als Soliſt.

, 1884

Das letzte diesjährige Konzert dieſer vorzüglichen Kapelle fand — wie gebührlich — vor überfülltem Saale ſtatt. Gleich die erſte Nummer des Programmes wurde mit verblüffender Virtuoſität und ſeltener Klangſchönheit ſeitens des Orcheſters wiedergegeben. Das war wohl auch der Hauptzweck ſolcher Auswahl, denn dieſe Symphonie dürfte kaum den bedeutſamſten muſikaliſchen Errungenſchaften unſerer Zeit beigezählt werden. Ueberhaupt iſt die Tſchaikowskomanie des amerikaniſchen Publikums ein bedenkliches Zeichen, das aber in unſerem ſchnellebigem Lande glücklicherweiſe ſchon wieder ſeiner Ueberwindung näher gerückt iſt. In ſo virtuoſer Art wiedergegeben, begrüßte das Publikum dieſe Symphonie, die faſt nach Art einer ruſſiſchen Suite gedacht iſt, mit rauſchendem Beifall.

Das Boſtoner Orcheſter aber darf ſich den ſeltenen Luxus geſtatten, vom Guten nur das Beſte zu bringen, und das darf — und muß man — von ihm auch verlangen.

Sehr fein war die Ausführung dreier Abſchnitte der Mozart'ſchen „Haffner Serenade", für deren Wiedergabe man dankbar ſein durfte, zumal ſich Prof. Witek in der meiſterlichen Durchführung der weitverzweigten Geigenſoli wieder als einer der berufenſten Vertreter ſeines Gebietes erwies. Weniger vollendet und abgetönt war die Orcheſterbegleitung des Beethoven'ſchen Es-dur-Konzerts, das Herr Paderewsky zu Gehör brachte. Er bot in ſeiner Wiedergabe eigentlich eine Ueberraſchung. Denn der Künſtler ſchien ſeine Perſönlichkeit möglichſt unterdrücken zu wollen und brachte das Werk in ungewohnt objektiver, faſt akademiſcher Weiſe zur Ausführung. Daß trotzdem Einzelheiten von eigenartiger Schönheit mit unterliefen, daß Paderewsky, wie kein Anderer, die Tonfarbe ſeines Klavieres der jeweiligen Klangfarbe des Orcheſters anzuſchmiegen und dadurch eine ſeltene Einheit des ganzen Werkes zu erreichen wußte, iſt bei dieſem großen Künſtler nur ſelbſtverſtändlich. Ganz er ſelbſt wurde Paderewsky jedoch erſt bei ſeinen Zugaben, dem Wagner-Liszt'ſchen „Iſolde's Liebestod", und vor allem einer Chopingruppe, die der Virtuoſe mit dem ganzen Zauber, der Genialität, der Farbenpracht ſeines Spieles zu umweben wußte. Das Publik[illegible] zeichnete ihn durch begeiſterten Beifall au[illegible]

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 18 1914

Paderewski and Boston Symphony Please Many

The appearance of either Paderewski or the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a welcome musical event in Washington, and the combination of the two served to crowd the National Theater yesterday afternoon.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 4, opened the program, and the playing of that demonstrated that the orchestra was to render a program in its usual finished and polished fashion. Dr. Karl Muck conducted.

The dramatic "l'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas, gave musical patrons of both the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphonies a chance to compare interpretations, for the former organization gave the piece here a month ago.

The playing of Paderewski aroused the usual enthusiasm.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski as Soloist Plays His Own Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on its fifth visit to New York, the last one of the season, devoted its concert last evening to works of three living composers, all of whom were present in the hall. George W. Chadwick's symphony in F, No. 3; Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson," and Ignace Paderewski's concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra were the works presented; and Mr. Paderewski played the pianoforte part in his concerto.

The two American compositions did honor to American art, and the audience was enthusiastic in its applause of both of them. Mr. Chadwick's symphony is twenty years old and more. It won a prize offered by the National Conservatory of New York in 1894, but it has had a more fortunate career than many prize compositions, which are often not heard of a second time. It is dedicated to Theodore Thomas, and he played it not once but several times, and the Boston Orchestra has played it before. It has been said of this symphony that it was composed at a time when the writing of melody was not considered necessarily the proof of a sterile mind, nor the resolution of discords an indication of imbecility.

Mr. Chadwick's symphony is not deficient in frank melody, often of a distinguished sort and his harmonic treatment is rich and expressive, even though it has few of the significant features that are considered "modern" to-day. The music is strong, vigorous, manly, without affectation, both in the themes and in the development through which they are put, and this development is not only lucid and logical, but it is also finely and artistically conceived, musically beautiful. Mr. Chadwick's use of the orchestra is skillful, giving color and euphony. The symphony dates from the time when Dr. Dvorak was urging "Americanism" upon American composers, and whether or not that was the influence there are a few suggestions of a turn of melody that might be considered to be derived from the folk song of the negroes. At all events this symphony may be considered and prized as truly American music.

Mr. Goldmark, in his symphonic poem, "Samson," on the other hand, has deliberately chosen an esoteric subject, and has devoted his resources to representing the emotional and dramatic aspects of the Old Testament narrative, and, at the end, to some suggestion of the demolition of the Temple. But this delineation is hardly more than suggested, and Mr. Goldmark has done wisely in keeping to the field that music more rightfully claims as its own. The piece is in one movement, but there are four divisions, intended to portray Samson, Delilah, the betrayal, and the end in the Temple. The general impression is of somewhat too great length, and an insufficient differentiation and contrast of the musical substance.

There is, in fact, something of monotony. Yet there is much that is noble, dignified, impassioned, and exalted in Mr. Goldmark's music; finely expressive themes, stirring development of them, and an especially fine skill in the orchestral treatment, which is warmly, at times gorgeously, colored. There is little or no attempt to produce an Oriental atmosphere; but the mood of passion, of despair, of tragedy, is little lightened and ends by becoming oppressive. It was the first performance in New York of Mr. Goldmark's composition, which is still in manuscript; an admirable performance, as was that of Mr. Chadwick's symphony.

Mr. Paderewski's concerto, after a long rest, had been heard in New York a few weeks ago from Miss Katherine Goodson. The composer played it with inimitable brilliancy, power, and bravura, with elegiac tenderness and poetry in the passages of cantilena.

The music has vitality, though the composer did not forget when he wrote it that one of the purposes of a concerto is display. In the last movement, indeed, he gave this a preponderating role. Yet even in the most dazzling pages of this music there is something more than mere glitter; there is a substance beneath it, and this Mr. Paderewski raised to its highest power.

From HERALD
Address: New York
MAR 22 1914

Audience Cheers as Paderewski Plays Encores

Eminent Polish Pianist Breaks No Encore Rule of Boston Symphony, to Delight of His Hearers.

When Paderewski started to break the "no encore" rule at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony Concert at Carnegie Hall a roar of delight went up from about three thousand throats. It could have been heard a block. It was the season's final concert of the orchestra, and it is doubtful if Carnegie Hall ever housed a larger audience. Hundreds were turned away after every available inch of standing room was filled.

The early part of the programme was sedate enough, Dr. Muck conducting his famous virtuosi orchestra in a most brilliant performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony—the third movement of which was so exquisitely played that the audience made the players rise and then bombarded them with applause. Then came three movements from Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," which sounded comparatively dull and in which Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, did not distinguish himself by his solo work.

Now came the lodestone of the concert, Mr. Paderewski's playing of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. But the Polish pianist was tardy in making his appearance. After a wait of several minutes Dr. Muck started back to find out what the trouble was. He reappeared soon, followed by Paderewski, who was greeted with applause, which was as tame as a murmur compared to the later demonstration. He really played in a masterly manner, indulging in no "pounding," but charging the slow movement of the work with compelling beauty of tone and sentiment, while the final rondo was marked by infectuous spirit and virility. It was a beautiful performance, and Dr. Muck conducted a superb accompaniment.

Then the orchestra members snatched their instruments, feeling the call of Boston, and hurried away, while the lights were dimmed and the audience roared as Mr. Paderewski sat down and played the opening bars of the Wagner-Liszt "Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde," following it with other encores until the audience had applauded its palms sore.

So the staid Boston Symphony concerts had one of its inviolable rules of "no encores" broken, but then "a king can do no wrong." The management condoned it and the huge audience revelled in it.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
MAR 22 1914
Date

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES LAST MATINEE

Mr. Paderewski's Reading of Beethoven Music Arouses Great Enthusiasm.

WITEK IS VIOLIN SOLOIST

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade Please.

The last matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The audience was one of great size, and its enthusiasm was aroused more than once in the course of the entertainment. The programme comprised Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Mozart's "Haffner" serenade and Beethoven's E flat piano concerto. The pianist, as on Thursday evening, was Mr. Paderewski.

The arrangement of the programme was not ideal, but since it was apparently the aim to save the famous pianist for the finale, the Mozart composition, written to celebrate the marriage of Elizabeth Haffner, daughter of the burgomaster of Salzburg, served well to bridge the chasm of style between the symphony and the concerto. The solo violin part in the serenade was generally well played by Concertmeister Anton Witek, who brought to it some good qualities of tone and the crispness of technic demanded by its character.

The concert thus became one continuous exhibition of virtuosity, for the orchestral performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony was something to be cherished in the memory. It was an extraordinary achievement in technical brilliancy and finish. Every [illegible] with opulence [illegible] and with exquisitely adjusted nuance, while in the larger effects the splendor of the sonorous proclamations was paired with the perfection of balance and the unceasing preservation of clarity. The pizzicato ostinato, that dazzling piece of orchestral staccato, was taken at a tremendous tempo and carried through with amazing accuracy of phraseology and gradation of accent. This movement called forth a storm of applause, and Dr. Muck had to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment of it.

After the quieting delivery of the clear and sunny music of Mozart, the mind was ready for the broad and dignified interpretation of the noble "Emperor" concerto. The virtuosity displayed here by Mr. Paderewski was of the higher type, that which unites adequacy of technic with fitness of style. The concerto, as all music lovers know, does not require the most brilliant effects of modern piano playing, but demands large musical appreciation and the ability to make the piano sing in the grand manner. Mr. Paderewski played the concerto like a master, with largeness of conception and loftiness of style, and his almost amazing command of the secrets of cantilena was displayed in the proper places in its full beauty. It was unfortunate that there was a slight difference in pitch between piano and orchestra.

The audience was insistent that the soloist should add something to the programme. Purists naturally regret to see audiences make such demands and still more to see famous artists yield to them. After the "Emperor" concerto what? If we were all artists we would answer silence and recollections. But since we are not, perhaps we must extenuate Mr. Paderewski's consenting to play encores. Yet again some will wish that he had played a piece of real piano music and not Liszt's transcription of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Boſton Symphony Orcheſter. — Paderewsky als Soliſt.

Das letzte diesjährige Konzert dieſer vorzüglichen Kapelle fand — wie gebührlich — vor überfülltem Saale ſtatt. Gleich die erſte Nummer des Programmes wurde mit verblüffender Virtuoſität und ſeltener Klangſchönheit ſeitens des Orcheſters wiedergegeben. Das war wohl auch der Hauptzweck ſolcher Auswahl, denn dieſe Symphonie dürfte kaum den bedeutſamſten muſikaliſchen Errungenſchaften unſerer Zeit beigezählt werden. Ueberhaupt iſt die Tſchaikowskomanie des amerikaniſchen Publikums ein bedenkliches Zeichen, das aber in unſerem ſchnellebigem Lande glücklicherweiſe ſchon wieder ſeiner Ueberwindung näher gerückt iſt. In ſo virtuoſer Art wiedergegeben, begrüßte das Publikum dieſe Symphonie, die faſt nach Art einer ruſſiſchen Suite gedacht iſt, mit rauſchendem Beifall.

Das Boſtoner Orcheſter aber darf ſich den ſeltenen Luxus geſtatten, vom Guten nur das Beſte zu bringen, und das darf — und muß man — von ihm auch verlangen.

Sehr fein war die Ausführung dreier Abſchnitte der Mozart'ſchen „Haffner Serenade“, für deren Wiedergabe man dankbar ſein durfte, zumal ſich Prof. Witek in der meiſterlichen Durchführung der weitverzweigten Geigenſoli wieder als einer der berufenſten Vertreter ſeines Gebietes erwies. Weniger vollendet und abgetönt war die Orcheſterbegleitung des Beethoven'ſchen Es-dur-Konzerts, das Herr Paderewsky zu Gehör brachte. Er bot in ſeiner Wiedergabe eigentlich eine Ueberraſchung. Denn der Künſtler ſchien ſeine Perſönlichkeit möglichſt unterdrücken zu wollen und brachte das Werk in ungewohnt objektiver, faſt akademiſcher Weiſe zur Ausführung. Daß trotzdem Einzelheiten von eigenartiger Schönheit mit unterliefen, daß Paderewsky, wie kein Anderer, die Tonfarbe ſeines Klavieres der jeweiligen Klangfarbe des Orcheſters anzuſchmiegen und dadurch eine ſeltene Einheit des ganzen Werkes zu erreichen wußte, iſt bei dieſem großen Künſtler nur ſelbſtverſtändlich. Ganz er ſelbſt wurde Paderewsky jedoch erſt bei ſeinen Zugaben, dem Wagner-Liszt'ſchen „Iſolde's Liebestod“, und vor allem einer Chopingruppe, die der Virtuoſe mit dem ganzen Zauber, der Genialität, der Farbenpracht ſeines Spieles zu umweben wußte. Das Publikum zeichnete ihn durch begeiſterten Beifall aus.

Newspaper Cutting

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914

NOTES OF TH

By ALGERNON

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday night was deftly arranged on compensatory principles. We had three compositions by composers whose reputations as such are not assured, and we had M. Paderewski as pianist as a part atonement.

A firm protest must be entered against the introduction into the New York programmes of the Boston Symphony Society of the symphonies of Mr. George Chadwick. This sort of thing is all very well in Boston, where the orchestra plays from October until May, but in New York the Bostonians can be heard but ten times in the year. Dr. Muck when in Boston is no doubt besieged, attacked, bombarded, threatened, cajoled, chauvinized, philistined, clamored, shouted, teapartied, cudgeled, tempested, pleaded, thundered and argued into performing localisms. But he is under no compulsion to strain his mercy to do so when he comes here. We do not ask any one to Chadwickize us. We view the outpourings of the New England school of symphonists and music ebullitionists with indifference. That indifference was once stirred, though in a wrong direction, by Dr. Horatio Parker's "Mona," which proved worse than its name.

For the rest, when one perused the forecast of Thursday's performance one's heart sank nine times the space that measures night from day. So long a spell of Chadwick! So little of Pope, so much of Pye! Then again there is published in the current programme—that luminous and voluminous work—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a list of the works performed during the year. It was a worthy and representative list, but Beethoven figured in it twice and Chadwick once.

Can Live One Part Down.

It is not to be held against Mr. Chadwick that he comes from New England. That can be lived down. But it is to be held against him that he writes symphonies, and by tacit sympathy and perhaps by overt aid and comfort encourages their performance.

Like nearly every ephemeral work of this kind it started off with a certain stateliness. In five minutes, however, it was in the wilderness, now tacking here, now veering there, now in a simoon, now in an oasis, now on the rocks, now on the path. First you had one style, then you had the other.

Owen Glendower used to keep impatient Hotspur up all night by reckoning up the names of the devils that were Owen's lackeys. I was kept awake on Thursday night by the process of reckoning up the names of the writers that had served Mr. Chadwick well as far as design and method were concerned, to say nothing of actual substance. There were, of course, those things which the populace call "melodies," though music cannot exist without melody. But "melody" in the popular sense is meant tunes so obvious that they can be borne in mind after one hearing, like the sentences in a primer as distinguished from the sentences in a poem. Never a moment of depth or mystery, or of musical eloquence, and this in a form that exacts these qualities to be tolerable.

There's a Difference.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date MAR 19 1914

PADEREWSKI OVATION FR

Baltimore music-lovers proved conclusively at the Lyric last night that Paderewski is still as much of a popular idol in this city as in the days when he first claimed attention as possibly the world's greatest pianist. His appearance—said to be his farewell—at the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the occasion for an outburst of enthusiasm such as has seldom been witnessed in either a music hall or a theater in this city.

Paderewski had appeared at the Lyric early in the season at an individual recital, but, while he was at that time noisily greeted, there was no such demonstration as took place last night, when he was literally forced to play an encore after he had finished the performance of his A Minor Concerto with the Orchestra.

This was a most unusual proceeding, as the policy of the Boston Symphony, and indeed most other orchestras of first importance, is sternly against encores. The exception made in Paderewski's case marked the first violation of the rule since the Boston musicians have been coming to Baltimore. A similar concession was made by Josef Stransky, director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at its last concert in the Lyric on March 9, when Alma Gluck was permitted to sing a number in addition to her program pieces.

Has Had Stormy Time.

Since Paderewski was here earlier in the season he has had a rather stormy time of it. Stories got out to the effect that he had subsidized an anti-Semetic paper in Warsaw, Russia, with a gift of $10,000, and despite the fact that these were vehemently denied he received a number of threatening letters from Nihilists living in this country. So great was the strain upon him that he was forced to cancel some of his engagements, and it was thought for a time that he would be unable to play in public again this season.

The same funny little chair, the one afflicted with spinal curvature, duck legs and Moorish complexion, was pushed into prominence just before he left the wings, and a moment later he was acknowledging the thunder of applause that arose when the first glimpse was caught of the mane that is his head of hai hair was all there, and it wa the same shade of light dus though a slight sprinkling o now veils its sheen.

Lived Up To Reputatio

Paderewski is notorious for people waiting, and he lived u reputation in this respect. H through a number of queer with the keyboard before he scended to give Dr. Muck th for the commencement. With note he seemed to forget hims closed his eyes at the first entr the piano into the score and ently became entirely oblivious of his surroundings, except whenever a crescendo was under way he woke up and motioned to Dr. Muck or to different groups of players as if to emphasize the climaxes.

After each of the three movements of the Concerto he was repaid by storms of applause, and at the conclusion the uproar was so great that he at length consented to play an encore.

He never plays in the full glare of the lights, so the house was thrown into semi-darkness and he took his place.

Exhibition Of Imperiousness.

Then the old imperiousness of the man showed itself forcibly. The audience had started to leave the house and there was a hubub all around. But this was soon stilled except for some confusion at the exits.

Paderewski waited a moment for this to be stilled also, and finding that there was yet some noise, though it was really negligible, he made a gesture of supreme disgust and stalked off the stage.

Again the audience broke into a storm and this time accompanied it by such a whirlwind of "hushes" that the more timorous did not dare move. Finding that at last quiet, absolute quiet, had been restored, Paderewski approached the piano once more in rather a bored but decidedly resentful attitude, and sat down and played one of the Mendelssohn "Songs Without Words," appending to it, through a quick modulation, Chopin's hackneyed "Butterfly Etude."

Great Artist Was In Brilliant Form

The fifth and last concert of this season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night proved, unfortunately, to be the least attractive of the series in spite of the fact that Paderewski, the soloist the occasion, was never in more liant form, and that the symph selected is both one of the grea and most universally popular in sy phonic literature.

Dr. Muck seemed somehow to in a cold and unsympathetic mo and this was especially felt in opening number of the program. writer has heard Beethoven's C Min Symphony over and over again, terpreted by all the most celebrat conductors of the day, but never before so perfunctory and unemotional a reading as that given last night. The first movement, which surely represents some great spiritual conflict, was played practically without rubato, and with such precision and disregard of subjectivity as almost to suggest the military element.

The second movement was more sympathetically rendered, but here both the wood and brass were distinctly out of tune in places, a very unusual occurrence with such an Orchestra as this. The scherzo was, on the whole, the best played of the four movements, but in the finale once again the military element was a great deal too predominant, though here, to some extent, justified by the character of the music itself.

The Mozart Serenade, in four movements, was an unfortunate selection, a typical specimen of unvarying optimism, diatonic, too persistently in the major key, and so characteristic of the formal epoch in which it was written. The really interesting feature here was the bright, spontaneous and virile playing of Mr. Witek in the solo parts.

The concluding number, with the composer at the piano, was Paderewski's "Concerto in A Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra," a work of much charm, but no great depth, and not particularly suggestive of Polish nationality.

Here, from the moment when Paderewski kept the orchestra waiting while he appeared to be dusting the keys of the piano, till the formal handshake between him and the conductor at the conclusion, there was a subtle suggestion of hostile temperaments between the two men.

We remarked before when Paderewski gave his recital at the Lyric earlier in the season, that he seemed to have lost nothing of his unique temperament and personality, but in this case the composition itself was scarcely calculated to draw out all the powers he still certainly possess, though he seemed to carry away the audience to a greater extent even than on the occasion of his last visit, and, what is more, to infect the orchestra itself with something of his own tremendous vitality.

H. D. P.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 1914

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

With Paderewski as soloist, Dr. Karl Muck conducted the season's last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, with enthusiasm running high and a programme of such ponderous extent [illegible] one of the numbers, Mozart's [illegible] heard "Haffner Serenade," (three movements), had to be omitted. Brahm's magnificent Symphony in E minor, in four movements, formed the concert's beginning and masterly musicianship was brought by every player to the rendition of this masterly work. Especially the second and fourth movements, the Andante moderato and the Allegro energico passionato, were a delight in every note and every strain and the latter, with its rousing volumes of sound and brilliant clarity, demonstrated once more while Dr. Muck and his players have a sufficient number of admirers to fill every hall where they appear.

"A Siegfried Idyl" was played with consumate skill and gossamer instrumental effect. Wagner's "Music of the Stairs" is always a favorite here and so charming are its opalascent strains that even poor musicians cannot harm it. In the hands of the players from the Hub all the joyous sentiment and sacred happiness which filled Wagner over the birth of his son, rises from the instruments and fills the soul of the listener.

The concert's most important offering was Paderewski's Concerto in A minor, played by himself. This is an important work which will live long after those who now have the privilege to hear this artist are gone; and while display is one of its principal features, its intrinsic value, its virility and sound emotional appeal are so vital. The great Pole was a bit impatient last night over the maudlin custom of treating him as he liked to be treated, when long hair made him notorious; for the silly rosebush, which somebody had placed near the piano, was ruthlessly pushed aside by him. But it is not true that he injured his hand in doing so.

Violinist, a recent "find" of McCormack's, will appear with him, and both will be accompanied by Vincent O'Brien.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her long-deferred song recital at the Academy on Monday evening, March 30. Illness led to the cancellation of all engagements some months ago, and her appearance is proof that a great artist's previous health has been restored.

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date MAR 21 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY FAREWELL

Splendid Programme, with Paderewski, for Last Concert Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said the season's farewell to Brooklyn last night at the Academy, and it was with great reluctance that the audience left after the final number, but not, however, until Paderewski had responded twice to encores.

Dr. Muck opened the concert with what is probably one of the dullest of the Brahms symphonies, the E minor, No. 4. Its only redeeming feature proved to be the second movement, which shows Mozartian influence with its legato string passages and fugue motifs.

The brass in this number were not in their best fettle; at times the blaring of the trombones affected the entire ensemble.

Because of the length of the programme, the "Taffner" Suite by Mozart, was omitted, and it remained for the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, to bring out the wonderful qualities for which the Boston Symphony is noted. Dr. Muck's reading of this number was one of splendid understanding and reverent tenderness, the strings modulating from the forte passages to the whispering pianissimo.

Paderewski, with his same eccentricities and nervous wringing of hands, made his appearance and after seating himself proceeded to push the potted plants which draped the footlights, into the audience. But when he playd his own concerto, one could close his eyes and rest content in the belief that he was still the finished master among master-pianists. Such portmento, such octave-playing and liquid quality of tone is seldom heard in Brooklyn.

To the wild outburst of enthusiasm after his number, Paderewski graciously responded with a Schumann hymn on an entirely darkened stage, which left such a profound impression on his audience that it compelled him to play a Mazurka by Chopin. The applause only subsided after the curtains were closed.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date MAR 30
Established:

Music and Musicians

Paderewski Double-Encores a Boston Symphony Trio of Living Men.

Near-Riot in Concert Hall Caps This Town's Triple Opera Furor.

Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony's hundred men in Carnegie Hall last night. He just played with them like a happy boy when school lets out. His own concerto, given six times in as many days and as many cities, found the musicians in perfect accord, if the pitch of instruments at all moments was not. At any rate, the mad pace of Polish dances, songs and national hymns toppled the sedatest New York audience off its dignity. There was a riot. The composer-pianist came out twice, embraced Dr. Muck, shook Witek's hand. Out went the stage lights then. But Paderewski had to reappear in the dark. On the fourth trip he walked to the piano and played a simple Chopin prelude, not the "Raindrop"; more like a "Teardrop" it sounded. Boxholders stood waving and shouting "Bravo!" The house yelled like Indians when it got a second encore, the rousing "Polonaise Militaire." Even at that the crowd clapped for another twenty minutes. It was after 11 o'clock when the last limousine left the door.

For the first time in its thirty-three years, the Boston organization had a programme all by living men. What's more, the three composers were present in the hall. The audience didn't discover the Bostonian Chadwick hidden in a box near the stage, but it applauded his symphony of frank melodies. Friendly eyes found Rubin Goldmark, of this town, after his "Samson," with its sure-enough hair-cutting cacophony and cataclysmic temple fall. The welcome to Paderewski atoned for any troubles on his tour. In fact, a man from a Jewish daily paper asked admission last night, offering a copy of his paper to show it was "all right" about that recent misunderstanding. There wasn't a seat for him in a house sold out for the last three years.

As this was the last visit this season, a line in the programme told that subscribers have till April 25 to retain their seats for next year. A deskful of new applications, literally by hundreds, is waiting to be opened at the offices in Boston, and only a few can hope to be added to the rolls here next November.

To-night the Brooklyn series closes with the Brahms Fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Paderewski concerto. To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee ends the season with Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony, a Mozart "Serenade," and the Beethoven concerto with Paderewski. The pianist appears with Schumann-Heink at a benefit matinee in Carnegie Hall next Saturday.

[148]

Newspaper Cutting

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York City
Date MAR 22 1914
Established: Lo

NOTES OF TH

By ALGERNON

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday night was deftly arranged on compensatory principles. We had three compositions by composers whose reputations as such are not assured, and we had M. Paderewski as pianist as a part atonement.

A firm protest must be entered against the introduction into the New York programmes of the Boston Symphony Society of the symphonies of Mr. George Chadwick. This sort of thing is all very well in Boston, where the orchestra plays from October until May, but in New York the Bostonians can be heard but ten times in the year. Dr. Muck when in Boston is no doubt besieged, attacked, bombarded, threatened, cajoled, chauvinized, philistined, clamored, shouted, teapartied, cudgeled, tempested, pleaded, thundered and argued into performing localisms. But he is under no compulsion to strain his mercy to do so when he comes here. We do not ask any one to Chadwickize us. We view the outpourings of the New England school of symphonists and music ebullitionists with indifference. That indifference was once stirred, though in a wrong direction, by Dr. Horatio Parker's "Mona," which proved worse than its name.

For the rest, when one perused the forecast of Thursday's performance one's heart sank nine times the space that measures night from day. So long a spell of Chadwick! So little of Pope, so much of Pye! Then again there is published in the current programme—that luminous and voluminous work—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a list of the works performed during the year. It was a worthy and representative list, but Beethoven figured in it twice and Chadwick once.

Can Live One Part Down.

It is not to be held against Mr. Chadwick that he comes from New England. That can be lived down. But it is to be held against him that he writes symphonies, and by tacit sympathy and perhaps by overt aid and comfort encourages their performance.

Like nearly every ephemeral work of this kind it started off with a certain stateliness. In five minutes, however, it was in the wilderness, now tacking here, now veering there, now in a simoon, now in an oasis, now on the rocks, now on the path. First you had one style, then you had the other.

Owen Glendower used to keep impatient Hotspun up all night by reckoning up the names of the devils that were Owen's lackeys. I was kept awake on Thursday night by the process of reckoning up the names of the writers that had served Mr. Chadwick well as far as design and method were concerned, to say nothing of actual substance. There were, of course, those things which the populace call "melodies," though music cannot exist without melody. But "melody" in the popular sense is meant tunes so obvious that they can be borne in mind after one hearing, like the sentences in a primer as distinguished from the sentences in a poem. Never a moment of depth or mystery, or of musical eloquence, and this in a form that exacts these qualities to be tolerable.

There's a Difference.

We

From CITIZENS
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date 21 1914
Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY FAREWELL

Splendid Programme, with Paderewski, for Last Concert Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said the season's farewell to Brooklyn last night at the Academy, and it was with great reluctance that the audience left after the final number, but not, however, until Paderewski had responded twice to encores.

Dr. Muck opened the concert with what is probably one of the dullest of the Brahms symphonies, the E minor, No. 4. Its only redeeming feature proved to be the second movement, which shows Mozartian influence with its legato string passages and fugue motifs.

The brass in this number were not in their best fettle; at times the blaring of the trombones affected the entire ensemble.

Because of the length of the programme, the "Taffner" Suite by Mozart, was omitted, and it remained for the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, to bring out the wonderful qualities for which the Boston Symphony is noted. Dr. Muck's reading of this number was one of splendid understanding and reverent tenderness, the strings modulating from the forte passages to the whispering pianissimos.

Paderewski, with his same eccentricities and nervous wringing of hands, made his appearance and after seating himself proceeded to push the potted plants which draped the footlights, into the audience. But when h playd his own concerto, one could close his eyes and rest content in the belief that he was still the finished master among master-pianists. Such portmento, such octave-playing and liquid quality of tone is seldom heard in Brooklyn.

To the wild outburst of enthusiasm after his number, Paderewski graciously responded with a Schumann hymn on an entirely darkened stage, which left such a profound impression on his audience that it compelled him to play a Mazurka by Chopin. The applause only subsided after the curtains were closed.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md. MAR 1[illegible] 1914
Date
Established

PADEREWSKI OVATION FR

Baltimore music-lovers proved conclusively at the Lyric last night that Paderewski is still as much of a popular idol in this city as in the days when he first claimed attention as possibly the world's greatest pianist. His appearance—said to be his farewell—at the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the occasion for an outburst of enthusiasm such as has seldom been witnessed in either a music hall or a theater in this city.

Paderewski had appeared at the Lyric early in the season at an individual recital, but, while he was at that time noisily greeted, there was no such demonstration as took place last night, when he was literally forced to play an encore after he had finished the performance of his A Minor Concerto with the Orchestra.

This was a most unusual proceeding, as the policy of the Boston Symphony, and indeed most other orchestras of first importance, is sternly against encores. The exception made in Paderewski's case marked the first violation of the rule since the Boston musicians have been coming to Baltimore. A similar concession was made by Josef Stransky, director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at its last concert in the Lyric on March 9, when Alma Gluck was permitted to sing a number in addition to her program pieces.

Has Had Stormy Time.

Since Paderewski was here earlier in the season he has had a rather stormy time of it. Stories got out to the effect that he had subsidized an anti-Semetic paper in Warsaw, Russia, with a gift of $10,000, and despite the fact that these were vehemently denied he received a number of threatening letters from Nihilists living in this country. So great was the strain upon him that he was forced to cancel some of his engagements, and it was thought for a time that he would be unable to play in public again this season.

The same funny little chair, the one afflicted with spinal curvature, duck legs and Moorish complexion, was pushed into prominence just before he left the wings, and a moment later he was acknowledging the thunder of applause that arose when the first glimpse was caught of the mane that is his head of hai hair was all there, and it wa the same shade of light dus though a slight sprinkling o now veils its sheen.

Lived Up To Reputatio

Paderewski is notorious for people waiting, and he lived u reputation in this respect. H through a number of queer with the keyboard before he scended to give Dr. Muck the for the commencement. With note he seemed to forget himse closed his eyes at the first entr the piano into the score and a ently became entirely oblivious of his surroundings, except whenever a crescendo was under way he woke up and motioned to Dr. Muck or to different groups of players as if to emphasize the climaxes.

After each of the three movements of the Concerto he was repaid by storms of applause, and at the conclusion the uproar was so great that he at length consented to play an encore.

He never plays in the full glare of the lights, so the house was thrown into semi-darkness and he took his place.

Exhibition Of Imperiousness.

Then the old imperiousness of the man showed itself forcibly. The audience had started to leave the house and there was a hubub all around. But this was soon stilled except for some confusion at the exits.

Paderewski waited a moment for this to be stilled also, and finding that there was yet some noise, though it was really negligible, he made a gesture of supreme disgust and stalked off the stage.

Again the audience broke into a storm and this time accompanied it by such a whirlwind of "hushes" that the more timorous did not dare move. Finding that at last quiet, absolute quiet, had been restored, Paderewski approached the piano once more in rather a bored but decidedly resentful attitude, and sat down and played one of the Mendelssohn "Songs Without Words," appending to it, through a quick modulation, Chopin's hackneyed "Butterfly Etude."

Great Artist Was In Brilliant Form

The fifth and last concert of this season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night proved, unfortunately, to be the least attractive of the series in spite of the fact that Paderewski, the soloist the occasion, was never in more liant form, and that the symph selected is both one of the grea and most universally popular in sy phonic literature.

Dr. Muck seemed somehow to in a cold and unsympathetic mo and this was especially felt in opening number of the program. writer has heard Beethoven's C Min Symphony over and over again, terpreted by all the most celebrat conductors of the day, but never before so perfunctory and unemotional a reading as that given last night. The first movement, which surely represents some great spiritual conflict, was played practically without rubato, and with such precision and disregard of subjectivity as almost to suggest the military element.

The second movement was more sympathetically rendered, but here both the wood and brass were distinctly out of tune in places, a very unusual occurrence with such an Orchestra as this. The scherzo was, on the whole, the best played of the four movements, but in the finale once again the military element was a great deal too predominant, though here, to some extent, justified by the character of the music itself.

The Mozart Serenade, in four movements, was an unfortunate selection, a typical specimen of unvarying optimism, diatonic, too persistently in the major key, and so characteristic of the formal epoch in which it was written. The really interesting feature here was the bright, spontaneous and virile playing of Mr. Witek in the solo parts.

The concluding number, with the composer at the piano, was Paderewski's "Concerto in A Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra," a work of much charm, but no great depth, and not particularly suggestive of Polish nationality.

Here, from the moment when Paderewski kept the orchestra waiting while he appeared to be dusting the keys of the piano, till the formal handshake between him and the conductor at the conclusion, there was a subtle suggestion of hostile temperaments between the two men.

We remarked before when Paderewski gave his recital at the Lyric earlier in the season, that he seemed to have lost nothing of his unique temperament and personality, but in this case the composition itself was scarcely calculated to draw out all the powers he still certainly possess, though he seemed to carry away the audience to a greater extent even than on the occasion of his last visit, and, what is more, to infect the orchestra itself with something of his own tremendous vitality. H. D. P.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 21 1914
Date
Est 1884

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

With Paderewski as soloist, Dr. Karl Muck conducted the season's last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, with enthusiasm running high and a programme of such ponderous extent that one of the numbers, Mozart's heard "Haffner Serenade," (three movements), had to be omitted. Brahm's magnificent Symphony in E minor, in four movements, formed the concert's beginning and masterly musicianship was brought by every player to the rendition of this masterly work. Especially the second and fourth movements, the Andante moderato and the Allegro energico passionato, were a delight in every note and every strain and the latter, with its rousing volumes of sound and brilliant clarity, demonstrated once more while Dr. Muck and his players have a sufficient number of admirers to fill every hall where they appear.

"A Siegfried Idyl" was played with consumate skill and gossamer instrumental effect. Wagner's "Music of the Stairs" is always a favorite here and so charming are its opalascent strains that even poor musicians cannot harm it. In the hands of the players from the Hub all the joyous sentiment and ssacred happiness which filled Wagner over the birth of his son, rises from the instruments and fills the soul of the listener.

The concert's most important offering was Paderewski's Concerto in A minor, played by himself. This is an important work which will live long after those who now have the privilege to hear this artist are gone; and while display is one of its principal features, its intrinsic value, its virility and sound emotional appeal are so vital. The great Pole was a bit impatient last night over the maudlin custom of treating him as he liked to be treated, when long hair made him notorious; for the silly rosebush, which somebody had placed near the piano, was ruthlessly pushed aside by him. But it is not true that he injured his hand in doing so.

---

violinist, a recent "find" of McCormack's, will appear with him, and both will be accompanied by Vincent O'Brien.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her long-deferred song recital at the Academy on Monday evening, March 30. Illness led to the cancellation of all engagements some months ago, and her appearance is proof that a great artist's previous health has been restored.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York City
Date
Established:

Music and Musicians

Paderewski Double-Encores a Boston Symphony Trio of Living Men.

Near-Riot in Concert Hall Caps This Town's Triple Opera Furor.

Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony's hundred men in Carnegie Hall last night. He just played with them like a happy boy when school lets out. His own concerto, given six times in as many days and as many cities, found the musicians in perfect accord, if the pitch of instruments at all moments was not. At any rate, the mad pace of Polish dances, songs and national hymns toppled the sedatest New York audience off its dignity. There was a riot. The composer-pianist came out twice, embraced Dr. Muck, shook Witek's hand. Out went the stage lights then. But Paderewski had to reappear in the dark. On the fourth trip he walked to the piano and played a simple Chopin prelude, not the "Raindrop": more like a "Teardrop" it sounded. Boxholders stood waving and shouting "Bravo!" The house yelled like Indians when it got a second encore, the rousing "Polonaise Militaire." Even at that the crowd clapped for another twenty minutes. It was after 11 o'clock when the last limousine left the door.

For the first time in its thirty-three years, the Boston organization had a programme all by living men. What's more, the three composers were present in the hall. The audience didn't discover the Bostonian Chadwick hidden in a box near the stage, but it applauded his symphony of frank melodies. Friendly eyes found Rubin Goldmark, of this town, after his "Samson," with its sure-enough hair-cutting cacophony and cataclysmic temple's fall. The welcome to Paderewski atoned for any troubles on his tour. In fact, a man from a Jewish daily paper asked admission last night, offering a copy of his paper to show it was "all right" about that recent misunderstanding. There wasn't a seat for him in a house sold out for the last three years.

As this was the last visit this season, a line in the programme told that subscribers have till April 25 to retain their seats for next year. A deskful of new applications, literally by hundreds, is waiting to be opened at the offices in Boston, and only a few can hope to be added to the rolls here next November. To-night the Brooklyn series closes with the Brahms Fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Paderewski concerto. To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee ends the season with Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony, a Mozart "Serenade," and the Beethoven concerto with Paderewski. The pianist appears with Schumann-Heink at a benefit matinee in Carnegie Hall next Saturday.

---

amount has not as yet been
the Merchants & Miners

SS H M Whitney, Calverth, New York.
Sch Emily F Northam, Humphrey, Shutes

[148]

Newspaper Cutti

From MOR'
Address:
Date
Established:

th gra ciety Chadw well in from O York the ten times in Boston is bombarded, t ized, philistin
teapartied, cudg thundered and a localisms. But he sion to strain his me
comes here. We do
Chadwickize us. We ings of the New Englan
phonists and music ebulli difference. That indiffere stirred, though in a wrong
Dr. Horatio Parker's "M
proved worse than its name.

For the rest, when one p forecast of Thursday's pro one's heart sank nine times the that measures night from day. So a spell of Chadwick! So little of Po so much of Pye! Then again there i published in the current programme—that luminous and voluminous work—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a list of the works performed during the year. It was a worthy and representative list, but Beethoven figured in it twice and Chadwick once.

Can Live One Part Down.

It is not to be held against Mr. Chadwick that he comes from New England. That can be lived down. But it is to be held against him that he writes symphonies, and by tacit sympathy and perhaps by overt aid and comfort encourages their performance.

Like nearly every ephemeral work of this kind it started off with a certain stateliness. In five minutes, however, it was in the wilderness, now tacking here, now veering there, now in a simoon, now in an oasis, now on the rocks, now on the path. First you had one style, then you had the other.

Owen Glendower used to keep impatient Hotspur up all night by reckoning up the names of the devils that were Owen's lackeys. I was kept awake on Thursday night by the process of reckoning up the names of the writers that had served Mr. Chadwick well as far as design and method were concerned, to say nothing of actual substance. There were, of course, those things which the populace call "melodies," though music cannot exist without melody. But "melody" in the popular sense is meant tunes so obvious that they can be borne in mind after one hearing, like the sentences in a primer as distinguished from the sentences in a poem. Never a moment of depth or mystery, or of musical eloquence, and this in a form that exacts these qualities to be tolerable.

There's a Difference.

We do not know Mr. Chadwick. He is no doubt a most worthy and prosperous gentleman; we do not know him from Adam, but we do know him from Beethoven.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md. MAR 19 1914
Date
Established

PADEREWSKI OVATION FR

Baltimore music-lovers proved conclusively at the Lyric last night that Paderewski is still as much of a popular idol in this city as in the days when he first claimed attention as possibly the world's greatest pianist. His appearance—said to be his farewell—at the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the occasion for an outburst of enthusiasm such as has seldom been witnessed in either a music hall or a theater in this city.

Paderewski had appeared at the Lyric early in the season at an individual recital, but, while he was at that time noisily greeted, there was no such demonstration as took place last night, when he was literally forced to play an encore after he had finished the performance of his A Minor Concerto with the Orchestra.

This was a most unusual proceeding, as the policy of the Boston Symphony, and indeed most other orchestras of first importance, is sternly against encores. The exception made in Paderewski's case marked the first violation of the rule since the Boston musicians have been coming to Baltimore. A similar concession was made by Josef Stransky, director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at its last concert in the Lyric on March 9, when Alma Gluck was permitted to sing a number in addition to her program pieces.

Has Had Stormy Time.

Since Paderewski was here earlier in the season he has had a rather stormy time of it. Stories got out to the effect that he had subsidized an anti-Semetic paper in Warsaw, Russia, with a gift of $10,000, and despite the fact that these were vehemently denied he received a number of threatening letters from Nihilists living in this country. So great was the strain upon him that he was forced to cancel some of his engagements, and it was thought for a time that he would be unable to play in public again this season.

The same funny little chair, the one afflicted with spinal curvature, duck legs and Moorish complexion, was pushed into prominence just before he left the wings, and a moment later he was acknowledging the thunder of applause that arose when the first glimpse was caught of the tawny mane that is his head of hair. The hair was all there, and it was about the same shade of light dusky red, though a slight sprinkling of gray now veils its sheen.

Lived Up To Reputation.

Paderewski is notorious for keeping people waiting, and he lived up to his reputation in this respect. He went through a number of queer actions with the keyboard before he condescended to give Dr. Muck the signal for the commencement. With the first note he seemed to forget himself. He closed his eyes at the first entrance of the piano into the score and apparently became entirely oblivious of his surroundings, except whenever a crescendo was under way he woke up and motioned to Dr. Muck or to different groups of players as if to emphasize the climaxes.

After each of the three movements of the Concerto he was repaid by storms of applause, and at the conclusion the uproar was so great that he at length consented to play an encore.

He never plays in the full glare of the lights, so the house was thrown into semi-darkness and he took his place.

Exhibition Of Imperiousness.

Then the old imperiousness of the man showed itself forcibly. The audience had started to leave the house and there was a hubub all around. But this was soon stilled except for some confusion at the exits.

Paderewski waited a moment for this to be stilled also, and finding that there was yet some noise, though it was really negligible, he made a gesture of supreme disgust and stalked off the stage.

Again the audience broke into a storm and this time accompanied it by such a whirlwind of "hushes" that the more timorous did not dare move. Finding that at last quiet, absolute quiet, had been restored, Paderewski approached the piano once more in rather a bored but decidedly resentful attitude, and sat down and played one of the Mendelssohn "Songs Without Words," appending to it, through a quick modulation, Chopin's hackneyed "Butterfly Etude."

Great Artist Was In Brilliant Form

The fifth and last concert of this season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night proved, unfortunately, to be the least attractive of the series in spite of the fact that Paderewski, the soloist of the occasion, was never in more brilliant form, and that the symphony selected is both one of the greatest and most universally popular in symphonic literature.

Dr. Muck seemed somehow to be in a cold and unsympathetic mood, and this was especially felt in the opening number of the program. The writer has heard Beethoven's C Minor Symphony over and over again, interpreted by all the most celebrated conductors of the day, but never before so perfunctory and unemotional a reading as that given last night. The first movement, which surely represents some great spiritual conflict, was played practically without rubato, and with such precision and disregard of subjectivity as almost to suggest the military element.

The second movement was more sympathetically rendered, but here both the wood and brass were distinctly out of tune in places, a very unusual occurrence with such an Orchestra as this. The scherzo was, on the whole, the best played of the four movements, but in the finale once again the military element was a great deal too predominant, though here, to some extent, justified by the character of the music itself.

The Mozart Serenade, in four movements, was an unfortunate selection, a typical specimen of unvarying optimism, diatonic, too persistently in the major key, and so characteristic of the formal epoch in which it was written. The really interesting feature here was the bright, spontaneous and virile playing of Mr. Witek in the solo parts.

The concluding number, with the composer at the piano, was Paderewski's "Concerto in A Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra," a work of much charm, but no great depth, and not particularly suggestive of Polish nationality.

Here, from the moment when Paderewski kept the orchestra waiting while he appeared to be dusting the keys of the piano, till the formal handshake between him and the conductor at the conclusion, there was a subtle suggestion of hostile temperaments between the two men.

We remarked before when Paderewski gave his recital at the Lyric earlier in the season, that he seemed to have lost nothing of his unique temperament and personality, but in this case the composition itself was scarcely calculated to draw out all the powers he still certainly possess, though he seemed to carry away the audience to a greater extent even than on the occasion of his last visit, and, what is more, to infect the orchestra itself with something of his own tremendous vitality.

H. D. P.

TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 21 1914
1884

USIC AND MUSICIANS

With Paderewski as soloist, Dr. Karl Muck conducted the season's last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, with enthusiasm running high and a programme of such ponderous extent that one of the numbers, Mozart's rarely heard "Haffner Serenade," (three movements), had to be omitted. Brahm's magnificent Symphony in E minor, in four movements, formed the concert's beginning and masterly musicianship was brought by every player to the rendition of this masterly work. Especially the second and fourth movements, the Andante moderato and the Allegro energico passionato, were a delight in every note and every strain and the latter, with its rousing volumes of sound and brilliant clarity, demonstrated once more while Dr. Muck and his players have a sufficient number of admirers to fill every hall where they appear.

"A Siegfried Idyl" was played with consumate skill and gossamer instrumental effect. Wagner's "Music of the Stairs" is always a favorite here and so charming are its opalascent strains that even poor musicians cannot harm it. In the hands of the players from the Hub all the joyous sentiment and ssacred happiness which filled Wagner over the birth of his son, rises from the instruments and fills the soul of the listener.

The concert's most important offering was Paderewski's Concerto in A minor, played by himself. This is an important work which will live long after those who now have the privilege to hear this artist are gone; and while display is one of its principal features, its intrinsic value, its virility and sound emotional appeal are so vital. The great Pole was a bit impatient last night over the mandlin custom of treating him as he liked to be treated, when long hair made him notorious; for the silly rosebush, which somebody had placed near the piano, was ruthlessly pushed aside by him. But it is not true that he injured his hand in doing so.

violinist, a recent "find" of McCormack's, will appear with him, and both will be accompanied by Vincent O'Brien.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her long-deferred song recital at the Academy on Monday evening, March 30. Illness led to the cancellation of all engagements some months ago, and her appearance is proof that a great artist's previous health has been restored.

---

the season's farewell to Brooklyn last night at the Academy, and it was with great reluctance that the audience left after the final number, but not, however, until Paderewski had responded twice to encores.

Dr. Muck opened the concert with what is probably one of the dullest of the Brahms symphonies, the E minor, No. 4. Its only redeeming feature proved to be the second movement, which shows Mozartian influence with its legato string passages and fugue motifs.

The brass in this number were not in their best fettle; at times the blaring of the trombones affected the entire ensemble.

Because of the length of the programme, the "Taffner" Suite by Mozart, was omitted, and it remained for the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, to bring out the wonderful qualities for which the Boston Symphony is noted. Dr. Muck's reading of this number was one of splendid understanding and reverent tenderness, the strings modulating from the forte passages to the whispering pianissimos.

Paderewski, with his same eccentricities and nervous wringing of hands, made his appearance and after seating himself proceeded to push the potted plants which draped the footlights, into the audience. But when h playd his own concerto, one could close his eyes and rest content in the belief that he was still the finished master among masterpianists. Such portmento, such octaveplaying and liquid quality of tone is seldom heard in Brooklyn.

To the wild outburst of enthusiasm after his number, Paderewski graciously responded with a Schumann hymn on an entirely darkened stage, which left such a profound impression on his audience that it compelled him to play a Mazurka by Chopin. The applause only subsided after the curtains were closed.

ING SUN
New York City
MAR 30

Music and Musicians

Paderewski Double-Encores a Boston Symphony Trio of Living Men.

Near-Riot in Concert Hall Caps This Town's Triple Opera Furor.

Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony's hundred men in Carnegie Hall last night. He just played with them like a happy boy when school lets out. His own concerto, given six times in as many days and as many cities, found the musicians in perfect accord, if the pitch of instruments at all moments was not. At any rate, the mad pace of Polish dances, songs and national hymns toppled the sedatest New York audience off its dignity. There was a riot. The composer-pianist came out twice, embraced Dr. Muck, shook Witek's hand. Out went the stage lights then. But Paderewski had to reappear in the dark. On the fourth trip he walked to the piano and played a simple Chopin prelude, not the "Raindrop"; more like a "Teardrop" it sounded. Boxholders stood waving and shouting "Bravo!" The house yelled like Indians when it got a second encore, the rousing "Polonaise Militaire." Even at that the crowd clapped for another twenty minutes. It was after 11 o'clock when the last limousine left the door.

For the first time in its thirty-three years, the Boston organization had a programme all by living men. What's more, the three composers were present in the hall. The audience didn't discover the Bostonian Chadwick hidden in a box near the stage, but it applauded his symphony of frank melodies. Friendly eyes found Rubin Goldmark, of this town, after his "Samson," with its sure-enough hair-cutting cacophony and cataclysmic temple's fall. The welcome to Paderewski atoned for any troubles on his tour. In fact, a man from a Jewish daily paper asked admission last night, offering a copy of his paper to show it was "all right" about that recent misunderstanding. There wasn't a seat for him in a house sold out for the last three years.

As this was the last visit this season, a line in the programme told that subscribers have till April 25 to retain their seats for next year. A deskful of new applications, literally by hundreds, is waiting to be opened at the offices in Boston, and only a few can hope to be added to the rolls here next November.

To-night the Brooklyn series closes with the Brahms Fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Paderewski concerto. To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee ends the season with Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony, a Mozart "Serenade," and the Beethoven concerto with Paderewski. The pianist appears with Schumann-Heink at a benefit matinee in Carnegie Hall next Saturday.

[148]

Newspaper Cutti

From MOR'

Address :

Date

Established:

D

V

th gra
ciety Chadw well in from O York the ten times
in Boston is bombarded, t
ized, philistin
teapartied, sndg thundered, and localisms. But he sion to strain his me
comes here. We do
Chadwickize us. We ings of the New Englan
phonists and music ebulli difference. That indiffere
stirred, though in a wrong
Dr. Horatio Parker's "M
proved worse than its name.

For the rest, when one p
forecast of Thursday's pe one's heart sank nine times the
that measures night from day. So a spell of Chadwick! So little of Po so much of Pye! Then again there published in the current programme—that luminous and voluminous work—of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a list of the works performed during the year. It was a worthy and representative list, but Beethoven figured in it twice and Chadwick once.

Can Live One Part Down.

It is not to be held against Mr. Chadwick that he comes from New England. That can be lived down. But it is to be held against him that he writes symphonies, and by tacit sympathy and perhaps by overt aid and comfort encourages their performance.

Like nearly every ephemeral work of this kind it started off with a certain stateliness. In five minutes, however, it was in the wilderness, now tacking here, now veering there, now in a simoon, now in an oasis, now on the rocks, now on the path. First you had one style, then you had the other.

Owen Glendower used to keep impatient Hotspun up all night by reckoning up the names of the devils that were Owen's lackeys. I was kept awake on Thursday night by the process of reckoning up the names of the writers that had served Mr. Chadwick well as far as design and method were concerned, to say nothing of actual substance. There were, of course, those things which the populace call "melodies," though music cannot exist without melody. But "melody" in the popular sense is meant tunes so obvious that they can be borne in mind after one hearing, like the sentences in a primer as distinguished from the sentences in a poem. Never a moment of depth or mystery, or of musical eloquence, and this in a form that exacts these qualities to be tolerable.

There's a Difference.

We do not know Mr. Chadwick. He is no doubt a most worthy and prosperous gentleman; we do not know him from Adam, but we do know him from Beethoven.

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md. MAR 1[illegible] 1914

Date

Established

PADEREWSKI OVATION FR

Baltimore music-lovers proved conclusively at the Lyric last night that Paderewski is still as much of a popular idol in this city as in the days when he first claimed attention as possibly the world's greatest pianist. His appearance—said to be his farewell—at the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the occasion for an outburst of enthusiasm such as has seldom been witnessed in either a music hall or a theater in this city.

Paderewski had appeared at the Lyric early in the season at an individual recital, but, while he was at that time noisily greeted, there was no such demonstration as took place last night, when he was literally forced to play an encore after he had finished the performance of his A Minor Concerto with the Orchestra.

This was a most unusual proceeding, as the policy of the Boston Symphony, and indeed most other orchestras of first importance, is sternly against encores. The exception made in Paderewski's case marked the first violation of the rule since the Boston musicians have been coming to Baltimore. A similar concession was made by Josef Stransky, director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at its last concert in the Lyric on March 9, when Alma Gluck was permitted to sing a number in addition to her program pieces.

Has Had Stormy Time.

Since Paderewski was here earlier in the season he has had a rather stormy time of it. Stories got out to the effect that he had subsidized an anti-Semetic paper in Warsaw, Russia, with a gift of $10,000, and despite the fact that these were vehemently denied he received a number of threatening letters from Nihilists living in this country. So great was the strain upon him that he was forced to cancel some of his engagements, and it was thought for a time that he would be unable to play in public again this season.

The same funny little chair, the one afflicted with spinal curvature, duck legs and Moorish complexion, was pushed into prominence just before he left the wings, and a moment later he was acknowledging the thunder of applause that arose when the first glimpse was caught of the tawny mane that is his head of hair. The hair was all there, and it was about the same shade of light dusky red, though a slight sprinkling of gray now veils its sheen.

Lived Up To Reputation.

Paderewski is notorious for keeping people waiting, and he lived up to his reputation in this respect. He went through a number of queer actions with the keyboard before he condescended to give Dr. Muck the signal for the commencement. With the first note he seemed to forget himself. He closed his eyes at the first entrance of the piano into the score and apparently became entirely oblivious of his surroundings, except whenever a crescendo was under way he woke up and motioned to Dr. Muck or to different groups of players as if to emphasize the climaxes.

After each of the three movements of the Concerto he was repaid by storms of applause, and at the conclusion the uproar was so great that he at length consented to play an encore.

He never plays in the full glare of the lights, so the house was thrown into semi-darkness and he took his place.

Exhibition Of Imperiousness.

Then the old imperiousness of the man showed itself forcibly. The audience had started to leave the house and there was a hubub all around. But this was soon stilled except for some confusion at the exits.

Paderewski waited a moment for this to be stilled also, and finding that there was yet some noise, though it was really negligible, he made a gesture of supreme disgust and stalked off the stage.

Again the audience broke into a storm and this time accompanied it by such a whirlwind of "hushes" that the more timorous did not dare move. Finding that at last quiet, absolute quiet, had been restored, Paderewski approached the piano once more in rather a bored but decidedly resentful attitude, and sat down and played one of the Mendelssohn "Songs Without Words," appending to it, through a quick modulation, Chopin's hackneyed "Butterfly Etude."

Great Artist Was In Brilliant Form

The fifth and last concert of this season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night proved, unfortunately, to be the least attractive of the series in spite of the fact that Paderewski, the soloist of the occasion, was never in more brilliant form, and that the symphony selected is both one of the greatest and most universally popular in symphonic literature.

Dr. Muck seemed somehow to be in a cold and unsympathetic mood, and this was especially felt in the opening number of the program. The writer has heard Beethoven's C Minor Symphony over and over again, interpreted by all the most celebrated conductors of the day, but never before so perfunctory and unemotional a reading as that given last night. The first movement, which surely represents some great spiritual conflict, was played practically without rubato, and with such precision and disregard of subjectivity as almost to suggest the military element.

The second movement was more sympathetically rendered, but here both the wood and brass were distinctly out of tune in places, a very unusual occurrence with such an Orchestra as this. The scherzo was, on the whole, the best played of the four movements, but in the finale once again the military element was a great deal too predominant, though here, to some extent, justified by the character of the music itself.

The Mozart Serenade, in four movements, was an unfortunate selection, a typical specimen of unvarying optimism, diatonic, too persistently in the major key, and so characteristic of the formal epoch in which it was written. The really interesting feature here was the bright, spontaneous and virile playing of Mr. Witek in the solo parts.

The concluding number, with the composer at the piano, was Paderewski's "Concerto in A Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra," a work of much charm, but no great depth, and not particularly suggestive of Polish nationality.

Here, from the moment when Paderewski kept the orchestra waiting while he appeared to be dusting the keys of the piano, till the formal handshake between him and the conductor at the conclusion, there was a subtle suggestion of hostile temperaments between the two men.

We remarked before when Paderewski gave his recital at the Lyric earlier in the season, that he seemed to have lost nothing of his unique temperament and personality, but in this case the composition itself was scarcely calculated to draw out all the powers he still certainly possess, though he seemed to carry away the audience to a greater extent even than on the occasion of his last visit, and, what is more, to infect the orchestra itself with something of his own tremendous vitality. H. D. P.

TIMES

Brooklyn, N. Y. MAR 21 1914

1884

USIC AND MUSICIANS

ith Paderewski as soloist, Dr. Karl ck conducted the season's last concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, with enthusiasm running high and a programme of such ponderous extent that one of the numbers, Mozart's heard "Haffner Serenade," (three movements), had to be omitted. Brahm's magificent Symphony in E minor, in four novements, formed the concert's beginning and masterly musicianship was brought by every player to the rendition of this masterly work. Especially the second and fourth movements, the Andante moderato and the Allegre energico passionato, were a delight in every note and every strain and the latter, with its rousing volumes of sound and brillant clarity, demonstrated once more while Dr. Muck and his players have a sufficient number of admirers to fill every hall where they appear.

"A Siegfried Idyl" was played with consumate skill and gossamer instrumental effect. Wagner's "Music of the Stairs" is always a favorite here and so charming are its opalascent strains that even poor musicians cannot harm it. In the hands of the players from the Hub all the joyous sentiment and ssacred happiness which filled Wagner over the birth of his son, rises from the instruments and fills the soul of the listener.

The concert's most important offering was Paderewski's Concerto in A minor, played by himself. This is an important work which will live long after those who now have the privilege to hear this artist are gone; and while display is one of its principal features, its intrinsic value, its virility and sound emotional appeal are so vital. The great Pole was a bit impatient last night over the maudlin custom of treating him as he liked to be treated, when long hair made him notorious; for the silly rosebush, which somebody had placed near the piano, was ruthlessly pushed aside by him. But it is not true that he injured his hand in doing so.

violinist, a recent "find" of McCormack's, will appear with him, and both will be accompanied by Vincent O'Brien.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her long-deferred song recital at the Academy on Monday evening, March 30. Illness led to the cancellation of all engagements some months ago, and her appearance is proof that a great artist's previous health has been restored.

---

the season's farewell to Brooklyn last night at the Academy, and it was with great reluctance that the audience left after the final number, but not, however, until Paderewski had responded twice to encores.

Dr. Muck opened the concert with what is probably one of the dullest of the Brahms symphonies, the E minor, No. 4. Its only redeeming feature proved to be the second movement, which shows Mozartian influence with its legato string passages and fugue motifs.

The brass in this number were not in their best fettle; at times the blaring of the trombones affected the entire ensemble.

Because of the length of the programme, the "Taffner" Suite by Mozart, was omitted, and it remained for the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, to bring out the wonderful qualities for which the Boston Symphony is noted. Dr. Muck's reading of this number was one of splendid understanding and reverent tenderness, the strings modulating from the forte passages to the whispering pianissimos.

Paderewski, with his same eccentricities and nervous wringing of hands, made his appearance and after seating himself proceeded to push the potted plants which draped the footlights, into the audience. But when h playd his own concerto, one could close his eyes and rest content in the belief that he was still the finished master among masterpianists. Such portmento, such octaveplaying and liquid quality of tone is seldom heard in Brooklyn.

To the wild outburst of enthusiasm after his number, Paderewski graciously responded with a Schumann hymn on an entirely darkened stage, which left such a profound impression on his audience that it compelled him to play a Mazurka by Chopin. The applause only subsided after the curtains were closed.

ING SUN

New York City

Music and Musicians

Paderewski Double-Encores a Boston Symphony Trio of Living Men.

Near-Riot in Concert Hall Caps This Town's Triple Opera Furor.

Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony's hundred men in Carnegie Hall last night. He just played with them like a happy boy when school lets out. His own concerto, given six times in as many days and as many cities, found the musicians in perfect accord, if the pitch of instruments at all moments was not. At any rate, the mad pace of Polish dances, songs and national hymns toppled the sedatest New York audience off its dignity. There was a riot. The composer-pianist came out twice, embraced Dr. Muck, shook Witek's hand. Out went the stage lights then. But Paderewski had to reappear in the dark. On the fourth trip he walked to the piano and played a simple Chopin prelude, not the "Raindrop": more like a "Teardrop" it sounded. Boxholders stood waving and shouting "Bravo!" The house yelled like Indians when it got a second encore, the rousing "Polonaise Militaire." Even at that the crowd clapped for another twenty minutes. It was after 11 o'clock when the last limousine left the door.

For the first time in its thirty-three years, the Boston organization had a programme all by living men. What's more, the three composers were present in the hall. The audience didn't discover the Bostonian Chadwick hidden in a box near the stage, but it applauded his symphony of frank melodies. Friendly eyes found Rubin Goldmark, of this town, after his "Samson," with its sure-enough hair-cutting cacophony and cataclysmic temple's fall. The welcome to Paderewski atoned for any troubles on his tour. In fact, a man from a Jewish daily paper asked admission last night, offering a copy of his paper to show it was "all right" about that recent misunderstanding. There wasn't a seat for him in a house sold out for the last three years.

As this was the last visit this season, a line in the programme told that subscribers have till April 25 to retain their seats for next year. A deskful of new applications, literally by hundreds, is waiting to be opened at the offices in Boston, and only a few can hope to be added to the rolls here next November. To-night the Brooklyn series closes with the Brahms Fourth symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Paderewski concerto. To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee ends the season with Tschaikowsky's Fourth symphony, a Mozart "Serenade," and the Beethoven concerto with Paderewski. The pianist appears with Schumann-Heink at a benefit matinee in Carnegie Hall next Saturday.

---

amount has not as yet been the Me nts & Miners

55 H M Whitney, Colberth, New York.
Sch Emily F Northam, Huntley, Shulee

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 15 1914

k, 1884

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. Paderewski will be the soloist, playing his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. This Concerto he composed while he was studying in Vienna in 1888, and the work was played in that city that year by Madam Essipoff. The first performance of the Concerto in the United States was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, March 14, 1891, when Julia Rieve-King was the artist at the piano. The symphony will be Brahms, in E Minor, No. 4, and the other number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Concerto will conclude the concert.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI

* * *

The [illegible] popular con

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date MAR 20 1914

Established

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

The audiences that attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city aim to achieve an attitude of high dignity and reserve that, to be sure, permits of applause, even sometimes in ripples at wrong places, but the dignity and reserve are thereupon redoubled and survive these mishaps. Perhaps the striving for these qualities is incumbent upon those who enjoy the exclusive privilege of listening to the men from Boston, for it is, indeed, a very real privilege. Yet last evening at Carnegie Hall these somewhat placid concertgoers became wholly human, shuffled off their strivings for the nonce and had a comfortable little party like unto that indulged in by the Young things of the matinee recital. And it was Ignace Jan Paderewski who brought it all about.

Mr. Paderewski was the soloist of the evening, and appeared at the end of the programme, playing the piano portion of his own A minor concerto. It was a performance that should linger lovingly in the memory for a long time. It was a glinting piece of brilliancy, a stirring forthgiving of beauty. Moreover, it had the galvanic quality that communicates with the nerve centres of an audience, and Boston Symphony audiences have nerve centres in spite of outward appearances to the contrary. So these nerve centres were touched by the electric vibration, and Mr. Paderewski was showered with the ordinary matinee variety of applause in the ordinary or matinee quantity.

Then followed the Paderewski orgy. Dr. Muck, Mephistophelian conductor of the orchestra, effaced himself, probably with a coincident sardonic smile; the stage lights were turned out as Mr. Paderewski likes to have them and, lo, a Boston Symphony audience forgot its general rule of no encores, flocked to the foot of the stage and listened to the great Pole add Chopin to a programme that had been innocent of any intent toward this composer. The pianist played one of the nocturnes—one of the more sentimental outpourings of gently dripping sorrow into the night—and the audience asked for more. The A major polonaise followed and then this reviewer stole away, not having the time at his disposal to Perhaps one should not speak lightly of Paderewski and Chopin; perhaps there should be stuttering phrases caused by much bated breath; but, truth to tell, Mr. Paderewski has played Chopin better than he did at the end of last evening's concert and the pallid nocturne was a bit of pathos after the moving beauties of his own concerto, and especially after its stirring rondo.

The Paderewski concerto is so seldom heard in New York as to amount to a novelty to the generality of concertgoers. It happens that it had been played once before this season, the soloist being Miss Katherine Goodson, but it is no reflection upon this excellent pianist to add that it became a far different matter last evening with the composer at the piano and Dr. Muck and his men engaged in its orchestral portion. The concerto is indeed a work for orchestra with pianistic embroideries standing out like beautiful bosses upon its pattern. Its long, but clearly wrought first movement is a weft of felicitous ideas, eloquent in their thematic expression and the piano sets them in brilliant relief. The andante has an exquisite beauty in its purity and nobility of mood, and Mr. Paderewski bade the piano sing its intermingled song and it sang.

Before Mr. Paderewski's advent, Dr. Muck and his men devoted themselves—and the verb is as necessary as it is accurate—to some American music. Some of it might be labelled "Boston" and some "New York," but a none too rigorous search easily reveals the proximate stamp, "made in Germany." This American music consisted of the Third Symphony—in F major—of George Whitfield Chadwick, of Boston, and the latest orchestral work—a tone poem, "Samson"—by Rubin Goldmark, of New York, a nephew of Karl Goldmark.

No doubt Dr. Muck feels called upon to play music by Americans once and again, but perhaps his duty would be well enough done were he to confine this evidence of a momentarily transplanted patriotism to the city on the Charles. In any case, the Chadwick output might be left behind in Boston. The Chadwick symphony has a skybluish sentimentality running through its wooden veins, and perhaps one should be thankful for even that much semblance to the red blood of vitality.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" proved to be the most interesting in its first part, devoted to the enunciation of thematic material delineating the character of the Hebrew hero of hair and hesitancy. As a whole, it disclosed originality and cleverness, both in orchestral effects and thematic treatment. But essentially, it is merely illustrative, literary music.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date BROOKL

The dates of the Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music next season will be Friday evenings, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 11 and March 19. Subscribers to these concerts for the coming season may renew their subscriptions at any time between March 20 and May 20. After May 20 seats that are not reserved by this year's subscriber's will be allotted to new subscribers in the order in which their applications are received.

BOSTON GLOBE
MARCH 28

DR MUCK OBSERVES ADVENT OF SPRING

Plays the B Flat Symphony of Schumann.

D'Indy's "Day on the Mountain" and Spanish Caprice Included.

Dr Muck foretold well the first advance of Spring when he chose Schumann's vernal B flat major symphony for performance yesterday afternoon. This music, as filled with warmth, freshness and sunny skies as the day outside, seemed singularly appropriate. It was played with abounding romantic ardor, with the exulting upspringing impulse of feeling and of life which Schumann caught and published abroad in tone, as a group of the romanticist poets were arousing the world to the same thought in words.

It may be argued that Dr Muck's reading was too dramatic, or that it was too impeccable in proportion, of too faultless a symmetry to wear the guise of true spontaneity. Rather it was the superb perfection of his "effects" which carried unimpeded all the fullness and exuberance of emotion. There was the rhythmic impulse, the trenchant accentuation, the ebb and flow of nuance that was vitalizing. The slow movement was a noble song, and the delicately vivacious figuration in the last was played with superb effect.

The second number, D'Indy's "A Summer Day on the Mountain," is preferable in the second of its three parts, "The Afternoon." "Dawn" is not provocative of the imagination with which others have celebrated it. Nor is the third part, "Evening," except for the beautiful sustained passage for strings, altogether characterizing. The middle movement has striking episodes in the peasant's dance and the [illegible] of advancing and receding [illegible]. The piano, employed [illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.
MARCH 2

LIFE GLOWS IN SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Interpretation of Work at Once Poetical and Inspiriting.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Nineteenth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1.
D'Indy, A Summer Day on the Mountain.
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

It is often said that Schumann's instrumentation is muddy, and some have gone so far as to insist that his symphonic ideas were thought out for the piano and are not clearly expressed in the development; that the workmanship is crude, etc., etc. M. d'Indy, for example, commenting on the fact that Schumann's musical education was not thorough, that he rushed into composition begfore adequate preparation, gladly admits the genius shown in short pieces of simple construction, but adds that he found himself on strange ground when he endeavored to build a musical monument.

This no doubt is true, and yet the Symphony in B flat, called familiarly the "Spring" Symphony, as it was interpreted yesterday by Dr. Muck, was glowing with life; it was as a vernal riot. There was the exuberant season praised and loved in European countries, but known to New Englanders only by report as a theoretically fixed division of the year. For Dr. Muck, first of all, was singularly fortunate in his choice of tempi. The impetuous rush of the first Allegro did not prevent him from bringing out clearly the walk of each part, also the contrasts, the nuances that are often overlooked in the desire for speed. The pulse of the music beat rapidly, but the music itself was the exultation of a robust man, not fever, not hysteria. We have seldom, if ever, heard such an inspiriting and at the same time poetical reading of this work. The second movement was nobly sung; the sentiment was virile without any taint of sentimentalism. The Scherzo was admirably rhythmed, and with the animation of the Finale there was the requisite grace.

Vincent d'Indy was at work on his "Summer Day on the Mountain" when he visited Boston late in 1905, but the work was not produced in Paris until February, 1906. Dr. Muck brought it out here six years ago next month. The music was suggested by a prose poem of a rhapsodic nature by Roger de Pompelonne; at least this poem is printed on the fly leaf of the score, but it might better be said that the mountains of the Cevennes inspired these symphonic pictures as they inspired d'Indy's "Symphony for orchestra and piano on a Mountain Air," his suite "Mountain Poems" for pianos and some other works.

I wish that it were possible for an audience to read carefully the essay of Romain Rolland on M. d'Indy before hearing any one of his more elaborate compositions. Granting that d'Indy is a master of dramatic expression, orchestral color, style, Rolland argues that his artistic originality is derived from a deeper source, that is, from his own personality. Those of us who had the honor of meeting M. d'Indy and becoming acquainted with his pure and lofty views on art and the sweetness and nobility of his character are perhaps better able to appreciate his musical aims and the peculiar forms of his expression.

This composer, whose music is to the lover of merely sensuous strains, austere if not arid, has been influenced chiefly by his devout faith and by an intimate friendship with Nature. He is a man of broad culture, but this in a composer is of secondary importance. His music is intellectual, if you please, but it is the result of more than cerebral agitation. No one could have written these symphonic pictures unless he had lived near mountains and loved them. D'Indy has lifted up his eyes unto the hills and there he has found strength.

Whether this music is in a way a translation of the prose poem is immaterial. The ideas are the thing; next to them the use of them. Nor is this music forbidding, unless the expression of a communion with Nature is necessarily the revelation of an ascetic. Nor does the composer stand frowning and aloof, for there are reminders, through snatches of folk songs, of simple, rustic pleasures. It is not needful for enjoyment of this highly imaginative music, beautifully and superbly expressed, to follow closely the poem. If this poem were not printed in the program book, the music itself would inspire meditation and the uplifting of the soul. Sir Thomas Browne wrote: "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion and a profound contemplation of the first composer." The fine saying might now be applied with remarkable fitness to these symphonic pictures of Vincent d'Indy.

The Caprice on Spanish Themes, in spite of Tschaikowsky's praise, is by no means the most characteristic of Rimsky Korsakoff's pieces, nor in orchestration is it to be compared with his "Scheherazade." A man of the North played at being a Spaniard. Chabrier and Debussy have been more successful as foreigners in search of Spanish rhythms, melodic figures, and color, not to mention the Spaniards Albeniz and Geranados.

The program next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scottish" Symphony; Brahms concerto for violin (Carl Flesch, his first appearance here); Debussy, "Iberia."

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 28.

SPRING GREETED BY A SYMPHONY

Schumann's Vernal Work Fitly and Brilliantly Performed.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was appropriately brought out by Dr. Muck yesterday, when the grass was turning green on the lawns up near Symphony Hall and when the open cars were running by for the first time this year.

Also it was brilliantly performed, and the orchestra was applauded until it stood up. There was likewise a dashing performance of Rimsly-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." D'Indy's tone poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," which graphically depicts sunrise and sunset, had a sympathetic reading.

The Hungarian violinist, Carl Flesch, will make his Boston debut at next week's concerts. Flesch is a Hungarian by birth, but, like most of the leading musicians, lives in Berlin. He is now making his first tour of America. He is said more nearly to approach Joachim than any other violinist of the time. He will play the Braham concerto.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" will also be on this program. It was last played five years ago. The final number will be Debussy's brilliant piece, "Iberia."

ADVERTISER.
MARCH 28.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMMEMODERN

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY CREATES ENTHUSIASM

A Piece by D'Indy and a Caprice by Rimski-Korsakoff Make the Concert Long.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann......................Symphony in B-flat
D'Indy.........A Summer Day upon the Mountain
Rimski-Korsakoff.....Caprice on Spanish Themes

It was a keen pleasure to hear a Schumann symphony again, and the beautiful "Spring Symphony," the first of the Schumann set, the one that he composed when the sunshine of happiness was upon him, had evidently not lost any of its charm. In Schumann's case one cannot apply the words of the poet,—"The anguish of the singer makes the beauty of the strain"—for when he was in distress or sorrow he could compose but little. This symphony, and the two best cycles of "Lieder" in existence, were composed by him when the storm and stress of his wooing had passed away, when he had married Clara Wieck and settled down in serene contentment and happiness.

If one compares this symphony with the works of Richard Strauss, of Mahler, of Weingartner, of Florent Schmitt, of Lendvai, it seems a rather awkward bit of orchestral scoring. Weingartner has justly said that Schumann's symphonies are fully as satisfactory in a four-hand piano arrangement as in their orchestral guise. There are a dozen men alive at present who are high as the heavens above Schumann in the domain of tone coloring.

For all that, his orchestral works hold their place on the latter-day programmes tenaciously. For when it comes to a comparison of ideas, all of these great modern tone-colorists are most poverty-stricken when placed beside Schumann. Skill in figure development, genius in orchestral tints, talent for weaving complex tonal webs, are all that we are getting in most of the modern music; but oh, for just a little of the musical ideas that are strewn so copiously along the old pathway from Bach to Wagner!

Dr. Muck read the symphony as if he enjoyed it, and the men played with an abandon that was quite in the spirit of the jubilant work. The first movement was taken with excellent spirit and the opening fanfares rung out with a clangor half-defiant, half-triumphant. The trombone transition to the Scherzo was very impressive, but the Scherzo was taken (we think) too slow. It is true that Schumann was not always jubilant in his Scherzos, and that with him a great joy was a serious thing, but "Molto Vivace" is not exactly a majestic tempo, and there was more of reserve than abandon in this part of the performance.

Per contra, the finale went with a splendid rush and even the flute cadenza had its charm in this.

It is significant that Rimski-Korsakoff's Spanish work, ten measures of which display more tone-coloring than the whole Schumann symphony, did not make nearly the effect that the German work did. The Symphony was most fervently applauded, until the orchestra arose in acknowledgment.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 15 1914

k, 1884

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow night. Paderewski will be the soloist, playing his own Concerto in A Minor, Opus 17. This Concerto he composed while he was studying in Vienna in 1888, and the work was played in that city that year by Madam Essipoff. The first performance of the Concerto in the United States was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, March 14, 1891, when Julia Rieve-King was the artist at the piano. The symphony will be Brahms, in E Minor, No. 4, and the other number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Concerto will conclude the concert.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI

* * *

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address: New York City.
Date ~~MAR 20 1914~~
Established

PADEREWSKI SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

The audiences that attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city aim to achieve an attitude of high dignity and reserve that, to be sure, permits of applause, even sometimes in ripples at wrong places, but the dignity and reserve are thereupon redoubled and survive these mishaps. Perhaps the striving for these qualities is incumbent upon those who enjoy the exclusive privilege of listening to the men from Boston, for it is, indeed, a very real privilege. Yet last evening at Carnegie Hall these somewhat placid concertgoers became wholly human, shuffled off their strivings for the nonce and had a comfortable little party like unto that indulged in by the Young things of the matinee recital. And it was Ignace Jan Paderewski who brought it all about.

Mr. Paderewski was the soloist of the evening, and appeared at the end of the programme, playing the piano portion of his own A minor concerto. It was a performance that should linger lovingly in the memory for a long time. It was a glinting piece of brilliancy, a stirring forthgiving of beauty. Moreover, it had the galvanic quality that communicates with the nerve centres of an audience, and Boston Symphony audiences have nerve centres in spite of outward appearances to the contrary. So these nerve centres were touched by the electric vibration, and Mr. Paderewski was showered with the ordinary matinee variety of applause in the ordinary or matinee quantity.

Then followed the Paderewski orgy. Dr. Muck, Mephistophelian conductor of the orchestra, effaced himself, probably with a coincident sardonic smile; the stage lights were turned out as Mr. Paderewski likes to have them and, lo, a Boston Symphony audience forgot its general rule of no encores, flocked to the foot of the stage and listened to the great Pole add Chopin to a programme that had been innocent of any intent toward this composer. The pianist played one of the nocturnes—one of the more sentimental outpourings of gently dripping sorrow into the night—and the audience asked for more. The A major polonaise followed and then this reviewer stole away, not having the time at his disposal to Perhaps one should not speak lightly of Paderewski and Chopin; perhaps there should be stuttering phrases caused by much bated breath; but, truth to tell, Mr. Paderewski has played Chopin better than he did at the end of last evening's concert and the pallid nocturne was a bit of pathos after the moving beauties of his own concerto, and especially after its stirring rondo.

The Paderewski concerto is so seldom heard in New York as to amount to a novelty to the generality of concertgoers. It happens that it had been played once before this season, the soloist being Miss Katherine Goodson, but it is no reflection upon this excellent pianist to add that it became a far different matter last evening with the composer at the piano and Dr. Muck and his men engaged in its orchestral portion. The concerto is indeed a work for orchestra with pianistic embroideries standing out like beautiful bosses upon its pattern. Its long, but clearly wrought first movement is a weft of felicitous ideas, eloquent in their thematic expression and the piano sets them in brilliant relief. The andante has an exquisite beauty in its purity and nobility of mood, and Mr. Paderewski bade the piano sing its intermingled song and it sang.

Before Mr. Paderewski's advent, Dr. Muck and his men devoted themselves—and the verb is as necessary as it is accurate—to some American music. Some of it might be labelled "Boston" and some "New York," but a none too rigorous search easily reveals the proximate stamp, "made in Germany." This American music consisted of the Third Symphony—in F major—of George Whitfield Chadwick, of Boston, and the latest orchestral work—a tone poem, "Samson"—by Rubin Goldmark, of New York, a nephew of Karl Goldmark.

No doubt Dr. Muck feels called upon to play music by Americans once and again, but perhaps his duty would be well enough done were he to confine this evidence of a momentarily transplanted patriotism to the city on the Charles. In any case, the Chadwick output might be left behind in Boston. The Chadwick symphony has a skybluish sentimentality running through its wooden veins, and perhaps one should be thankful for even that much semblance to the red blood of vitality.

Mr. Goldmark's "Samson" proved to be the most interesting in its first part, devoted to the enunciation of thematic material, delineating the character of the Hebrew hero of hair and hesitancy. As a whole, it disclosed originality and cleverness, both in orchestral effects and thematic treatment. But essentially, it is merely illustrative, literary music.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date Brk

The dates of the Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music next season will be Friday evenings, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 13 and March 19. Subscribers to these concerts for the coming season may renew their subscriptions at any time between March 20 and May 20. After May 20 seats that are not reserved by this year's subscriber's will be allotted to new subscribers in the order in which their applications are received.

BOSTON GLOBE—
MARCH 28

DR MUCK OBSERVES ADVENT OF SPRING

Plays the B Flat Symphony of Schumann.

D'Indy's "Day on the Mountain" and Spanish Caprice Included.

Dr Muck foretold well the first advance of Spring when he chose Schumann's vernal B flat major symphony for performance yesterday afternoon. This music, as filled with warmth, freshness and sunny skies as the day outside, seemed singularly appropriate. It was played with abounding romantic ardor, with the exulting upspringing impulse of feeling and of life which Schumann caught and published abroad in tone, as a group of the romanticist poets were arousing the world to the same thought in words.

It may be argued that Dr Muck's reading was too dramatic, or that it was too impeccable in proportion, of too faultless a symmetry to wear the guise of true spontaneity. Rather it was the superb perfection of his "effects" which carried unimpeded all the fullness and exuberance of emotion. There was the rhythmic impulse, the trenchant accentuation, the ebb and flow of nuance that was vitalizing. The slow movement was a noble song, and the delicately vivacious figuration in the last was played with superb effect.

The second number, D'Indy's "A Summer Day on the Mountain," is preferable in the second of its three parts, "The Afternoon." "Dawn" is not provocative of the imagination with which others have celebrated it. Nor is the third part, "Evening," except for the beautiful sustained passage for strings, altogether characterizing. The middle movement has striking episo[illegible] in the peasant's dance and the [illegible] of advancing and receding [illegible]

The piano, employed [illegible] instrument, was [illegible] program [illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.
MARCH 2

LIFE GLOWS IN SCHUMANN'S SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Interpretation of Work at Once Poetical and Inspiriting.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Nineteenth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1.
D'Iidy, A Summer Day on the Mountain.
Rimsky-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish themes.

It is often said that Schumann's instrumentation is muddy, and some have gone so far as to insist that his symphonic ideas were thought out for the piano and are not clearly expressed in the development; that the workmanship is crude, etc., etc. M. d'Indy, for example, commenting on the fact that Schumann's musical education was not thorough, that he rushed into composition begfore adequate preparation, gladly admits the genius shown in short pieces of simple construction, but adds that he found himself on strange ground when he endeavored to build a musical monument.

This no doubt is true, and yet the Symphony in B flat, called familiarly the "Spring" Symphony, as it was interpreted yesterday by Dr. Muck, was glowing with life; it was as a vernal riot. There was the exuberant season praised and loved in European countries, but known to New Englanders only by report as a theoretically fixed division of the year. For Dr. Muck, first of all, was singularly fortunate in his choice of tempi. The impetuous rush of the first Allegro did not prevent him from bringing out clearly the walk of each part, also the contrasts, the nuances that are often overlooked in the desire for speed. The pulse of the music beat rapidly, but the music itself was the exultation of a robust man, not fever, not hysteria. We have seldom, if, ever, heard such an inspiriting and at the same time poetical reading of this work. The second movement was nobly sung; the sentiment was virile without any taint of sentimentalism. The Scherzo was admirably rhythmed, and with the animation of the Finale there was the requisite grace.

Vincent d'Indy was at work on his "Summer Day on the Mountain" when he visited Boston late in 1905, but the work was not produced in Paris until February, 1906. Dr. Muck brought it out here six years ago next month. The music was suggested by a prose poem of a rhapsodic nature by Roger de Pompelonne; at least this poem is printed on the fly leaf of the score, but it might better be said that the mountains of the Cevennes inspired these symphonic pictures as they inspired d'Indy's "Symphony for orchestra and piano on a Mountain Air," his suite "Mountain Poems" for pianos and some other works.

I wish that it were possible for an audience to read carefully the essay of Romain Rolland on M. d'Indy before hearing any one of his more elaborate compositions. Granting that d'Indy is a master of dramatic expression, orchestral color, style, Rolland argues that his artistic originality is derived from a deeper source, that is, from his own personality. Those of us who had the honor of meeting M. d'Indy and becoming acquainted with his pure and lofty views on art and the sweetness and nobility of his character are perhaps better able to appreciate his musical aims and the peculiar forms of his expression.

This composer, whose music is to the lover of merely sensuous strains, austere if not arid, has been influenced chiefly by his devout faith and by an intimate friendship with Nature. He is a man of broad culture, but this in a composer is of secondary importance. His music is intellectual, if you please, but it is the result of more than cerebral agitation. No one could have written these symphonic pictures unless he had lived near mountains and loved them. D'Indy has lifted up his eyes unto the hills and there he has found strength.

Whether this music is in a way a translation of the prose poem is immaterial. The ideas are the thing; next to them the use of them. Nor is this music forbidding, unless the expression of a communion with Nature is necessarily the revelation of an ascetic. Nor does the composer stand frowning and aloof, for there are reminders, through snatches of folk songs, of simple, rustic pleasures. It is not needful for enjoyment of this highly imaginative music, beautifully and superbly expressed, to follow closely the poem. If this poem were not printed in the program book, the music itself would inspire meditation and the uplifting of the soul. Sir Thomas Browne wrote: "Even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion and a profound contemplation of the first composer." The fine saying might now be applied with remarkable fitness to these symphonic pictures of Vincent d'Indy.

The Caprice on Spanish Themes, in spite of Tschaikowsky's praise, is by no means the most characteristic of Rimsky Korsakoff's pieces, nor in orchestration is it to be compared with his "Scheherazade." A man of the North played at being a Spaniard. Chabrier and Debussy have been more successful as foreigners in search of Spanish rhythms, melodic figures, and color, not to mention the Spaniards Albeniz and Geranados.

The program next week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, "Scottish" Symphony; Brahms concerto for violin (Carl Flesch, his first appearance here); Debussy, "Iberia."

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MARCH 28.

SPRING GREETED BY A SYMPHONY

Schumann's Vernal Work Fitly and Brilliantly Performed.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was appropriately brought out by Dr. Muck yesterday, when the grass was turning green on the lawns up near Symphony Hall and when the open cars were running by for the first time this year.

Also it was brilliantly performed, and the orchestra was applauded until it stood up. There was likewise a dashing performance of Rimsly-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." D'Indy's tone poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," which graphically depicts sunrise and sunset, had a sympathetic reading.

The Hungarian violinist, Carl Flesch, will make his Boston debut at next week's concerts. Flesch is a Hungarian by birth, but, like most of the leading musicians, lives in Berlin. He is now making his first tour of America. He is said more nearly to approach Joachim than any other violinist of the time. He will play the Braham concerto.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" will also be on this program. It was last played five years ago. The final number will be Debussy's brilliant piece, "Iberia."

ADVERTISER.
MARCH 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMMEMODERN

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY CREATES ENTHUSIASM

A Piece by D'Indy and a Caprice by Rimski-Korsakoff Make the Concert Long.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Schumann	Symphony in B-flat
D'Indy	A Summer Day upon the Mountain
Rimski-Korsakoff	Caprice on Spanish Themes

It was a keen pleasure to hear a Schumann symphony again, and the beautiful "Spring Symphony," the first of the Schumann set, the one that he composed when the sunshine of happiness was upon him, had evidently not lost any of its charm. In Schumann's case one cannot apply the words of the poet,—"The anguish of the singer makes the beauty of the strain"—for when he was in distress or sorrow he could compose but little. This symphony, and the two best cycles of "Lieder" in existence, were composed by him when the storm and stress of his wooing had passed away, when he had married Clara Wieck and settled down in serene contentment and happiness.

If one compares this symphony with the works of Richard Strauss, of Mahler, of Weingartner, of Florent Schmitt, of Lendvai, it seems a rather awkward bit of orchestral scoring. Weingartner has justly said that Schumann's symphonies are fully as satisfactory in a four-hand piano arrangement as in their orchestral guise. There are a dozen men alive at present who are high as the heavens above Schumann in the domain of tone coloring.

For all that, his orchestral works hold their place on the latter-day programmes tenaciously. For when it comes to a comparison of ideas, all of these great modern tone-colorists are most poverty-stricken when placed beside Schumann. Skill in figure development, genius in orchestral tints, talent for weaving complex tonal webs, are all that we are getting in most of the modern music; but oh, for just a little of the musical ideas that are strewn so copiously along the old pathway from Bach to Wagner!

Dr. Muck read the symphony as if he enjoyed it, and the men played with an abandon that was quite in the spirit of the jubilant work. The first movement was taken with excellent spirit and the opening fanfares rung out with a clangor half-defiant, half-triumphant. The trombone transition to the Scherzo was very impressive, but the Scherzo was taken (we think) too slow. It is true that Schumann was not always jubilant in his Scherzos, and that with him a great joy was a serious thing, but "Molto Vivace" is not exactly a majestic tempo, and there was more of reserve than abandon in this part of the performance.

Per contra, the finale went with a splendid rush and even the flute cadenza had its charm in this.

It is significant that Rimski-Korsakoff's Spanish work, ten measures of which display more tone-coloring than the whole Schumann symphony, did not make nearly the effect that the German work did. The Symphony was most fervently applauded, until the orchestra arose in acknowledgment.

The New York Pr holds no one NE

The public evidently realizes that tone-color (the trump card of the moderns) is not the essence of music. They begin to long for musical ideas and melodic thoughts. Mountain air is said to cure asthma. It also seems to cure musical asceticism, for D'Indy becomes a little more natural than is his wont when he deals with mountain subjects. We remember with a certain degree of pleasure how he once varied a mountain air into a symphony, and how hearty and rollicking certain parts of the work were. Nowadays one goes up Mount Washington, the Righi, and even the Jungfrau, by railway and by an elevator system, but D'Indy's mountain is not scaled so easily. We do not find the heartiness of the earlier mountain work in this composition, but it is still one that can be enjoyed, in parts, in the midst of its many ingenuities. D'Indy is a man who is in a larger school than Debussy. His great learning gives him a freedom in development which enables him to do many musical juggleries without becoming tiresome.

There is one point in this work which is unusual, the piano is used as an orchestral instrument. We scarcely think that the instrument is very effective in this guise. It forms a good foil to the orchestra, as the many great piano concertos show, but as an integral part of the orchestra neither Berlioz, nor Glinka, nor Van der Stucken, nor others who have used it as a simple tone-color, have convinced us that the bulky instrument pays for the labor of bringing it upon the stage.

The Mountain symphony has three movements, Morning, noon and night. There is a tremendous crescendo in the first movement,—"Dawn," and the sun rises from an inaudible pianissimo to an overwhelming fortissimo. It takes a Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a crescendo like that, "pochissimo a pochissimo," with a few piccolo birds thrown in.

The noon hour brought trouble, for there was much that was puzzling in the second movement of this work. There was the great ingenuity of D'Indy, but it seemed to demand a corresponding ingenuity on the part of each auditor to unravel its convolutions. We could not interpret the fury into which the rustic melody was thrown, nor the mutterings of the tempest, nor the military fragments; they may have had their legitimate meaning, but we required a detailed programme to understand them, and the movement was long, long, long, beyond belief.

"Night" was appropriately tranquil, with a poetic suggestion of distant bells. But what the sudden crash meant we cannot imagine. Has some one gone out in the darkness and fallen over a precipice?

Yet we found beauty and power in parts of the work, even if we did not fully like or understand it. D'Indy's mastery of tone-color and of musical progressions was bound to achieve that much, but the composition was dull at times and too prolix. The final picture of Night was so very graphic that a good many auditors thought that it was very late—and went home.

Extremes meet. When the present writer was in Norway he was told that there were strong commercial affiliations between that country and Spain, and there seem to be similar artistic affiliations between Russia and the more tropical country, for the Muscovites seem to enjoy setting Fandangos and Jotas in orchestral fantasies. Yet we prefer the Russian when he keeps to his own great repertoire of folk-music. We never can have enough from that great mine, and there is no need of going southward to seek new tonal worlds to conquer.

Rimski-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice is a fine display of tone-color. The instruments pass by in dress-parade, and many have obbligato effects that show them off as in a solo. Violin, flute, harp, etc., are heard in short solos and the whole work glitters and glows with modern orchestration. But the Spanish lilt soon becomes monotonous, and the mixture of Caviare and Garlic is not entirely successful.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 28,

"SPRING" SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Dr. Muck's Interpretation of Schumann's Work Questioned

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Schumann B-flat symphony, or the "Spring" symphony, as it is popularly and appropriately called; d'Indy's symphony, "A Summer Day on the Mountains," performed for the second time at these concerts, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" made the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FITTED THE SEASON

The music was singularly and strikingly in accordance with the season and the day outside. Schumann's symphony has its defects of instrumentation and symphonic style. Nevertheless it is a symphony, and an exhilarating one. It is as youthful and poetic today as it was when it first saw the light. And despite thickness or comparative lack of color, this symphony has many an original, personal and effective detail of instrumentation. Each of these details—and many of them are unknown to the hearer who listens to the average conductor as he reads the work—were admirably exposed by Dr. Muck. Where the composer had made a tentative attempt at a certain effect of color or accent the conductor realized this effect for him.

The orchestra fairly glowed, and it impressed upon one the comparative power of a tradition. If, despite our dislike of the thick and rugged orchestration of Johannes Grahms, we can admire the C minor symphony as we do, then why, in heaven's name, not admit that this delightful symphony of Schumann has, at least, twice as much transparency and color as the Titanic symphony in C minor? That is the case. The time-worn talk of Schumann's instrumentation—yes, that is true, but other things about Schumann, such as the incomparable freshness and joy of his music, are also worthy of note, and to be given preference before a fact that has been retailed a hundred times.

Interpretation Questioned

Dr. Muck, then, accomplished great things, from an instrumental point of view, with the symphony. His interpretation was another matter. If one considers Dr. Muck's interpretation from the objective point of view which is usually his as an interpreter, his performance of yesterday afternoon was a direct misinterpretation of Schumann. The slow movement was dragged at a wholly unnecessary pace and its singing was mannered. This is nothing but a simple song, containing in its own unsophisticated measures three times the meaning the conductor forced upon it. Why not be simple? Perhaps Dr. Muck, himself, is an all too sophisticated a man for the gentle and unassuming Schumann. Again, the tempi of the scherzo were in some places either too slow, and in others too fast. It is true that the sub-divisions of this movement were skilfully joined together, and that there were lovely nuances here and there, but the scherzo, in general, suffered as the slow movement had suffered before it. Both first and last movements of the symphony were boisterous, rather than surcharged with young and appealing enthusiasm. And too elaborated in matters of detail, too episodic. All this may be Dr. Muck's conception of Schumann, and he, as a distinguished musician, may have a right to that conception. But if Schumann is to be Schumann, Schumann was not Schumann yesterday afternoon.

But Mr. d'Indy's symphony! We cannot pretend to an intimate knowledge of this composition. We can only say that the performance seemed ideal, and sounded far more as though the work itself interested the conductor. Mr. d'Indy is here an impressionist, and a rather elderly impressionist. It is not only day, with him, on the mountains. It is somewhat Sunday, and a quiet and clear Sunday, at that. But well may those who have not known heights and forests envy the noble serenity, the clearness, the clear air, as one might say, of this composition, which is simply ravishing in its nature colors, and lofty mood. Harmonically it is simple, though modern. Instrumentally it is marvellous. Its simplicity conceals wonders of workmanship. It is the simplicity of a very great master of composition. It may also be said that the simplicity does not invariably ring true—not that it is affected—only that the ink-well ran dry for a minute or two! The inspiration is not continuous.

Muse Yawns a Bit

When d'Indy resorts to purely coloristic effects, and seeks to continue these effects ad infinitum, he appears to us a little ill at ease. There are much firmer lines, if less exalted, highfalutin', in the same composer's symphony on a mountain air. Yes, in the symphony played yesterday the muse yawns a little now and then, and yet one can say with sincerity that despite this the work as a whole made a profound impression.

That impression arose from its sincerity, which overcomes its shortcomings, at a time when Mr. d'Indy does not compose in so virile a manner as in earlier days. The feeling of the music then, and what was surely a superb performance, a performance really past all praise, were deservedly successful. d'Indy came again into his own, and it is reasonable to believe that if we heard oftener the d'Indy of this and earlier works, such as the "Istar" variations, the B-flat symphony, even the "Wallenstein" trilogy, we would bow always deeper before him.

The Spanish Rhapsody of Rimsky-Korsakoff is an intoxicating riot of rhythms and colors, and Dr. Muck surely made the most of it on this occasion.

TRANSCRIPT.

APRIL 4. 1914

SYMPHONY CONCERT

CARL FLESCH, VIOLINIST, HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE

A Masculine and Honest Technique—The Artist's "Violinistic" Tone—His Literal Style of Interpretation—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and Its Variable Delights—The "Iberia" Suite of Debussy and Dr. Muck's Underscoring of Its Voices

CARL FLESCH was soloist at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, playing the Brahms violin concerto. It was in every way a fitting choice for the virtuoso's first appearance in Boston. The work has a greater proportion of genuine music and a smaller proportion of mere display than any other famous concerto save that of Schumann for the piano; it is dignified and restrained, utterly without affectation and self-conscious preciosity. It is difficult—a thorough test for the soloist's technical and interpretive virtuosity—; yet it does not trade on this difficulty, or make the performer seem like a public martyr in the cause of entertainment. And these are the qualities of Mr. Flesch. He is above all a vigorous, even athletic performer. His tone is masculine and objective; his personality is literal and unaffected. He seems to be the self-respecting craftsman of his instrument rather than its self-conscious apostle. He is content to do his work well and let beauty come, as it should, as a by-product. His technique is highly capable, but in a reassuring way which makes the hearer forget it, convinced by its ample strength. There are no marks in his playing of the commercial virtuoso; he is the honest workman and interpreter.

Mr. Flesch has avoided every extreme and every affectation of contemporary violin playing. He takes his instrument literally for what it is—a violin, a stringed instrument of wood made to vibrate by a resined bow. He makes no effort after the "organ tone" of Mr. Ysaye, nor after the "human voice" tone of Mr. Elman, nor after the "flute tone" which some people are pleased to consider the chief glory of Mr. Kreisler. For the violin, under natural playing, plainly betrays its wood structure; honey smoothness is not natural to it, and cannot be got from it for any great length of time without a conscious strain and the sacrifice of much of its virile vigor. Mr. Flesch accepts this condition, and is willing to let his tone be as true as possible to the violin as man has made it concerning himself with doing his work well—with keeping the pitch accurate, with articulating distinctly, and with organizing his phrasing so as to make evident the structure of the music. His tone is, of course, varied, to express the various sorts of music he is playing; but still it is hardly proper to speak of Mr. Flesch's tones. His "tones" are derived from the one fundamental type of tone on which he has based his whole style. His soft, lyrical passages are substantially of the tone quality of his forte passages, only subdued in power. His trills have the same masculine quality of force; his delicate passages of staccato or saltando give to all the tiny notes a definite character. In all his technique he has let his instrument set his standards.

It is much to the credit of yesterday's audience that it appreciated this playing, which got along without the ordinary first aids to effectiveness. The reception given to the soloist, especially after the first movement, was so definitely favorable that one could not doubt but that the audience had definite opinions on the subject and appreciated Mr. Flesch's style of playing as a relief from the virtuotistic abuses to which they iolin is subjected every season b artists of wide reputation. It must require character in a violinist to avoid the easy road to superficial success; and it must be a greateful experience to feel one's audience responding to masterful "straight" playing because it has the same beliefs.

It must not be supposed that because Mr. Flesch eschewed trickery the concerto, under his hands, lacked color and variety. He refused to give the work any factitious color, but by making himself a conscientious interpreter of Brahms he brought out the lyricism which Brahms has so variously poured into the work. The first movement grew under his bow from a somewhat pensive soliloquy to a noble maestoso, the performer always the servant of the music. The adagio had its gentle sentiment, but never the soft sentimentality which besets slow movements for the violin. The last movement, taken rather slower than another temperament might have taken it, had energy rather than liveliness, force rather than sprightliness. But though this tempo may have made the orchestral interludes seem a little more heavy than necessary, it suited Mr. Flesch's style to the dot, and made the last movement acord with the exalted mood of the whole work much better than could a lighter reading.

There has been no more conscientious and self-effacing violin performance in Boston this season. There has not been a violin tone so literal and straightforward. There has not been a violin style more capable for such music as the Brahms, nor an example of violin art which more thoroughly conceals art. And through it all the masculine energy of Mr. Flesch's playing raises craftsmanship into a high order of interpretive art.

Decidedly Mendelssohn has "dated." The "Scotch" symphony, which opened yesterday's programme, had its delightful [illegible] introduc- [illegible] lovely. The vivace [illegible] engaging. The final [illegible] was good to hear even if it did sound a century old in its suave simplicity. But on the whole, though one may be glad to have heard the symphony, one does not write letters to the management about it, requesting its repetition. It was played by Dr. Muck and his band in thorough and polished style. The vivace especially was like chisselled ivory. Even Dr. Muck could not save the adagio with its parlor emotionalism, but wherever cleanness of execution and architectural firmness could add to the impressiveness of the work Mendelssohn was heard at his best. Of course there is nothing Scotch about the symphony. No doubt in Mendelssohn's time it was called an "idealisation." Thus do minor artists escape perpetually from an honest facing of their subject matter. Half a century of noble music has nurtured us away from this lily-white view of life. We konw now that Scotland possesses melodies far finer and deeper than any which Mendelssohn ever invented. But the composer wrote to suit his elegant nature and the age which adored him. We can enjoy him when he is in his happiest moments. We can especially delight in his plays of fanciful imagination — the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, the "Fingal's Cave," or the "Melusine." But the Scotch symphony may rest in Symphony Hall's library for another term of years, and we shall not complain if the term is a long one.

Dr. Muck's reading of Debussy's "Iberia" was distinguished by its emphasis on the individual voices. The sounds and smells and sights of the Spanish streets did not become a melang eof tone, but juxtaposed sense-impressions. Each stroke was poster-like. A Frenchman might want the parts of the composite picture more thoroughly blended, but no one can deny that Dr. Muck's reading was the greater glory for the orchestra, the more difficult feat. No voice was ever lost in the general body of tone. When he came to the final movement, the lively preparations for a village celebration, Dr. Muck gave an almost rough energy to the rhythmic snatches. In the second moement, where a "temperamental" conductor might have been most tempted to lose all the outline in a mass of perfumed tone, he kept the parts clear and distinct. It reminded one of Dr. Johnson's saying that Fielding gave an excellent picture of the way the clock looked, but Richardson both showed you the clock and the works inside. It was the harmony of high colors rather than of predominant tone; that of Manet rather than that of Monet. It was preëminently the reading of an analytical intelligence. But it did full justice to the poetry and imagination of Debussy.

H. K. M.

The public evidently realize that tone-color (the trump card of the moderns) is not the essence of music. They begin to long for musical ideas and melodic thoughts. Mountain air is said to cure asthma. It also seems to cure musical asceticism, for D'Indy becomes a little more natural than is his wont when he deals with mountain subjects. We remember with a certain degree of pleasure how he once varied a mountain air into a symphony, and how hearty and rollicking certain parts of the work were. Nowadays one goes up Mount Washington, the Righi, and even the Jungfrau, by railway and by an elevator system, but D'Indy's mountain is not scaled so easily. We do not find the heartiness of the earlier mountain work in this composition, but it is still one that can be enjoyed, in parts, in the midst of its many ingenuities. D'Indy is a man who is in a larger school than Debussy. His great learning gives him a freedom in development which enables him to do many musical juggleries without becoming tiresome.

There is one point in this work which is unusual, the piano is used as an orchestral instrument. We scarcely think that the instrument is very effective in this guise. It forms a good foil to the orchestra, as the many great piano concertos show, but as an integral part of the orchestra neither Berlioz, nor Glinka, nor Van der Stucken, nor others who have used it as a simple tone-color, have convinced us that the bulky instrument pays for the labor of bringing it upon the stage.

The Mountain symphony has three movements, Morning, noon and night. There is a tremendous crescendo in the first movement,—"Dawn," and the sun rises from an inaudible pianissimo to an overwhelming fortissimo. It takes a Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a crescendo like that, "pochissimo a pochissimo," with a few piccolo birds thrown in.

The noon hour brought trouble, for there was much that was puzzling in the second movement of this work. There was the great ingenuity of D'Indy, but it seemed to demand a corresponding ingenuity on the part of each auditor to unravel its convolutions. We could not interpret the fury into which the rustic melody was thrown, nor the mutterings of the tempest, nor the military fragments; they may have had their legitimate meaning, but we required a detailed programme to understand them, and the movement was long, long, long, beyond belief.

"Night" was appropriately tranquil, with a poetic suggestion of distant bells. But what the sudden crash meant we cannot imagine. Has some one gone out in the darkness and fallen over a precipice?

Yet we found beauty and power in parts of the work, even if we did not fully like or understand it. D'Indy's mastery of tone-color and of musical progressions was bound to achieve that much, but the composition was dull at times and too prolix. The final picture of Night was so very graphic that a good many auditors thought that it was very late—and went home.

Extremes meet. When the present writer was in Norway he was told that there were strong commercial affiliations between that country and Spain, and there seem to be similar artistic affiliations between Russia and the more tropical country, for the Muscovites seem to enjoy setting Fandangos and Jotas in orchestral fantasies. Yet we prefer the Russian when he keeps to his own great repertoire of folk-music. We never can have enough from that great mine, and there is no need of going southward to seek new tonal worlds to conquer.

Rimski-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice is a fine display of tone-color. The instruments pass by in dress-parade, and many have obbligato effects that show them off as in a solo. Violin, flute, harp, etc., are heard in short solos and the whole work glitters and glows with modern orchestration. But the Spanish lilt soon becomes monotonous, and the mixture of Caviare and Garlic is not entirely successful.

BOSTON POST,

MARCH 28,

"SPRING" SYMPHONY PERFORMED

Dr. Muck's Interpretation of Schumann's Work Questioned

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Schumann B-flat symphony, or the "Spring" symphony, as it is popularly and appropriately called; d'Indy's symphony, "A Summer Day on the Mountains," performed for the second time at these concerts, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" made the programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FITTED THE SEASON

The music was singularly and strikingly in accordance with the season and the day outside. Schumann's symphony has its defects of instrumentation and symphonic style. Nevertheless, it is a symphony, and an exhilarating one. It is as youthful and poetic today as it was when it first saw the light. And despite thickness or comparative lack of color, this symphony has many an original, personal and effective detail of instrumentation. Each of these details—and many of them are unknown to the hearer who listens to the average conductor as he reads the work—were admirably exposed by Dr. Muck. Where the composer had made a tentative attempt at a certain effect of color or accent the conductor realized this effect for him.

The orchestra fairly glowed, and it impressed upon one the comparative power of a tradition. If, despite our dislike of the thick and rugged orchestration of Johannes Grahms, we can admire the C minor symphony as we do, then why, in heaven's name, not admit that this delightful symphony of Schumann has, at least, twice as much transparency and color as the Titanic symphony in C minor? That is the case. The time-worn talk of Schumann's instrumentation—yes, that is true, but other things about Schumann, such as the incomparable freshness and joy of his music, are also worthy of note, and to be given preference before a fact that has been retailed a hundred times.

Interpretation Questioned

Dr. Muck, then, accomplished great things, from an instrumental point of view, with the symphony. His interpretation was another matter. If one considers Dr. Muck's interpretation from the objective point of view which is usually his as an interpreter, his performance of yesterday afternoon was a direct misinterpretation of Schumann. The slow movement was dragged at a wholly unnecessary pace and its singing was mannered. This is nothing but a simple song, containing in its own unsophisticated measures three times the meaning the conductor forced upon it. Why not be simple? Perhaps Dr. Muck, himself, is an all too sophisticated a man for the gentle and unassuming Schumann. Again, the tempi of the scherzo were in some places either too slow, and in others too fast. It is true that the sub-divisions of this movement were skilfully joined together, and that there were lovely nuances here and there, but the scherzo, in general, suffered as the slow movement had suffered before it. Both first and last movements of the symphony were boisterous, rather than surcharged with young and appealing enthusiasm. And too elaborated in matters of detail, too episodic. All this may be Dr. Muck's conception of Schumann, and he, as a distinguished musician, may have a right to that conception. But if Schumann is to be Schumann, Schumann was not Schumann yesterday afternoon.

But Mr. d'Indy's symphony! We cannot pretend to an intimate knowledge of this composition. We can only say that the performance seemed ideal, and sounded far more as though the work itself interested the conductor. Mr. d'Indy is here an impressionist, and a rather elderly impressionist. It is not only day, with him, on the mountains. It is somewhat Sunday, and a quiet and clear Sunday, at that. But well may those who have not known heights and forests envy the noble serenity, the clearness, the clear air, as one might say, of this composition, which is simply ravishing in its nature colors, and lofty mood. Harmonically it is simple, though modern. Instrumentally it is marvellous. Its simplicity conceals wonders of workmanship. It is the simplicity of a very great master of composition. It may also be said that the simplicity does not invariably ring true—not that it is affected—only that the ink-well ran dry for a minute or two! The inspiration is not continuous.

Muse Yawns a Bit

When d'Indy resorts to purely coloristic effects, and seeks to continue these effects ad infinitum, he appears to us a little ill at ease. There are much firmer lines, if less exalted, highfalutin', in the same composer's symphony on a mountain air. Yes, in the symphony played yesterday the muse yawns a little now and then, and yet one can say with sincerity that despite this the work as a whole made a profound impression.

That impression arose from its sincerity, which overcomes its shortcomings, at a time when Mr. d'Indy does not compose in as virile a manner as in earlier days. The feeling of the music then, and what was surely a superb performance, a performance really past all praise, were deservedly successful. d'Indy came again into his own, and it is reasonable to believe that if we heard oftener the d'Indy of this and earlier works, such as the "Istar" variations, the B-flat symphony, even the "Wallenstein" trilogy, we would bow always deeper before him.

The Spanish Rhapsody of Rimsky-Korsakoff is an intoxicating riot of rythms and colors, and Dr. Muck surely made the most of it on this occasion.

TRANSCRIPT.

APRIL 4. 1914

SYMPHONY CONCERT

CARL FLESCH, VIOLINIST, HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME HERE

A Masculine and Honest Technique—The Artist's "Violinistic" Tone—His Literal Style of Interpretation—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and Its Variable Delights—The "Iberia" Suite of Debussy and Dr. Muck's Underscoring of Its Voices

CARL FLESCH was soloist at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, playing the Brahms violin concerto. It was in every way a fitting choice for the virtuoso's first appearance in Boston. The work has a greater proportion of genuine music and a smaller proportion of mere display than any other famous concerto save that of Schumann for the piano; it is dignified and restrained, utterly without affectation and self-conscious preciosity. It is difficult—a thorough test for the soloist's technical and interpretive virtuosity—; yet it does not trade on this difficulty, or make the performer seem like a public martyr in the cause of entertainment. And these are the qualities of Mr. Flesch. He is above all a vigorous, even athletic performer. His tone is masculine and objective; his personality is literal and unaffected. He seems to be the self-respecting craftsman of his instrument rather than its self-conscious apostle. He is content to do his work well and let beauty come, as it should, as a by-product. His technique is highly capable, but in a reassuring way which makes the hearer forget it, convinced by its ample strength. There are no marks in his playing of the commercial virtuoso; he is the honest workman and interpreter.

Mr. Flesch has avoided every extreme and every affectation of contemporary violin playing. He takes his instrument literally for what it is—a violin, a stringed instrument of wood made to vibrate by a resined bow. He makes no effort after the "organ tone" of Mr. Ysaye, nor after the "human voice" tone of Mr. Elman, nor after the "flute tone" which some people are pleased to consider the chief glory of Mr. Kreisler. For the violin, under natural playing, plainly betrays its wood structure; honey smoothness is not natural to it, and cannot be got from it for any great length of time without a conscious strain and the sacrifice of much of its virile vigor. Mr. Flesch accepts this condition, and is willing to let his tone be as true as possible to the violin as man has made it concerning himself with doing his work well—with keeping the pitch accurate, with articulating distinctly, and with organizing his phrasing so as to make evident the structure of the music. His tone is, of course, varied, to express the various sorts of music he is playing; but still it is hardly proper to speak of Mr. Flesch's tones. His "tones" are derived from the one fundamental type of tone on which he has based his whole style. His soft, lyrical passages are substantially of the tone quality of his forte passages, only subdued in power. His trills have the same masculine quality of force; his delicate passages of staccato or saltando give to all the tiny notes a definite character. In all his technique he has let his instrument set his standards.

It is much to the credit of yesterday's audience that it appreciated this playing, which got along without the ordinary first aids to effectiveness. The reception given to the soloist, especially after the first movement, was so definitely favorable that one could not doubt but that the audience had definite opinions on the subject and appreciated Mr. Flesch's style of playing as a relief from the virtuotistic abuses to which thev iolin is subjected every season b artists of wide reputation. It must require character in a violinist to avoid the easy road to superficial success; and it must be a greateful experience to feel one's audience responding to masterful "straight" playing because it has the same beliefs.

It must not be supposed that because Mr. Flesch eschewed trickery the concerto, under his hands, lacked color and variety. He refused to give the work any factitious color, but by making himself a conscientious interpreter of Brahms he brought out the lyricism which Brahms has so variously poured into the work. The first movement grew under his bow from a somewhat pensive soliloquy to a noble maestoso, the performer always the servant of the music. The adagio had its gentle sentiment, but never the soft sentimentality which besets slow movements for the violin. The last movement, taken rather slower than another temperament might have taken it, had energy rather than liveliness, force rather than sprightliness. But though this tempo may have made the orchestral interludes seem a little more heavy than necessary, it suited Mr. Flesch's style to the dot, and made the last movement acord with the exalted mood of the whole work much better than could a lighter reading.

There has been no more conscientious and self-effacing violin performance in Boston this season. There has not been a violin tone so literal and straightforward. There has not been a violin style more capable for such music as the Brahms, nor an example of violin art which more thoroughly conceals art. And through it all the masculine energy of Mr. Flesch's playing raises craftsmanship into a high order of interpretive art.

Decidedly Mendelssohn has "dated." The "Scotch" symphony, which opened yesterday's programme, had its delightful [illegible]

[illegible] lovely. The vivace was [illegible] and engaging. [illegible] final maestoso was good to hear even if it did sound a century old in its suave simplicity. But on the whole, though one may be glad to have heard the symphony, one does not write letters to the management about it, requesting its repetition. It was played by Dr. Muck and his band in thorough and polished style. The vivace especially was like chisselled ivory. Even Dr. Muck could not save the adagio with its parlor emotionalism, but wherever cleanness of execution and architectural firmness could add to the impressiveness of the work Mendelssohn was heard at his best. Of course there is nothing Scotch about the symphony. No doubt in Mendelssohn's time it was called an "idealization." Thus do minor artists escape perpetually from an honest facing of their subject matter. Half a century of noble music has nurtured us away from this lily-white view of life. We konw now that Scotland possesses melodies far finer and deeper than any which Mendelssohn ever invented. But the composer wrote to suit his elegant nature and the age which adored him. We can enjoy him when he is in his happiest moments. We can especially delight in his plays of fanciful imagination — the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, the "Fingal's Cave," or the "Melusine." But the Scotch symphony may rest in Symphony Hall's library for another term of years, and we shall not complain if the term is a long one.

Dr. Muck's reading of Debussy's "Iberia" was distinguished by its emphasis on the individual voices. The sounds and smells and sights of the Spanish streets did not become a melang eof tone, but juxtaposed sense-impressions. Each stroke was posterlike. A Frenchman might want the parts of the composite picture more thoroughly blended, but no one can deny that Dr. Muck's reading was the greater glory for the orchestra, the more difficult feat. No voice was ever lost in the general body of tone. When he came to the final movement, the lively preparations for a village celebration, Dr. Muck gave an almost rough energy to the rhythmic snatches. In the second moement, where a "temperamental" conductor might have been most tempted to lose all the outline in a mass of perfumed tone, he kept the parts clear and distinct. It reminded one of Dr. Johnson's saying that Fielding gave an excellent picture of the way the clock looked, but Richardson both showed you the clock and the works inside. It was the harmony of high colors rather than of predominant tone; that of Manet rather than that of Monet. It was preëminently the reading of an analytical intelligence. But it did full justice to the poetry and imagination of Debussy.

H. K. M.

MONITOR,
APRIL 4, 1914

Soloist at Symphony Concert Applauded for His Reading of German Composer's Piece for Violin With Orchestra

MENDELSSOHN HEARD

Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the twentieth public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the violinist, presented the Brahms' concerto in [illegible] r for violin and orches[illegible] in D ma[illegible] l won the hearty applause of the large audience. The solo number was preceded by the Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony in A minor, and followed by the Debussy tone poem, "Iberia."

Mr. Flesch is an unusual type of orchestral soloist. He belongs neither among the artists who go out for popular favor nor among those who set themselves up as high academic authorities. He has none of the ways of the performer who brings the throngs up to the platform after the concert is over. And he has none of the bearing of the artist who assumes to give the last word of interpretation from European studios. He comes before his house to present composers for precisely what they are worth as recorders of the sentiment and the manners of their times. He puts no different value on a piece of orchestral music with a solo part than he would put on one without it. The Brahms concerto to him is Brahms making a picture of German life in the seventies, just what any other composition of Brahms in the same epoch would be. No fictitious value whatever is attached to the music because it happens to contain a part in which he can show off a violin of beautiful tone or display an execution of astonishing smoothness.

The soloist of the twentieth rehearsal was like a man of the orchestra itself in declaring the Brahms sentiment. He was as much a part of the organization of tone-makers that Dr. Muck directs as was Mr. Witek when he appeared in the middle of the season in the Tschaikowsky concerto. But there was one difference between the circumstances under which Mr. Flesch played and those under which Dr. Muck's concertmaster left the first desk of the violins and came forward as soloist. The visitor of Friday was held back by the orchestra. The first violinist of the orchestra when he made his appearance had all his associate artists with him urging him ahead.

The Flesch interpretation of the Brahms concerto was a great performance on the expressive side. It could not be, as was the Witek interpretation of the Tschaikowsky concerto, a greater performance on the mechanical side. Seldom does the man at the front of the platform give Dr. Muck's baton such a task as Mr. Flesch gave it. But that does not change the essential situation. The soloist just the same was a part of the organization with which he played. The only difference of purpose between him and the conductor was as to the time at which certain passages ought to go. Mr. Flesch was inclined at times to speed. Dr. Muck was inclined at all times to moderation. Dr. Muck thinks that notes, even in the accompanying part to a concerto were written to be played, not to be skipped over. That is a small point, perhaps, but soloists who visit Boston must understand it.

Mendelssohn, the despised composer of the present epoch of melodic and harmonic freedom, made a good showing in actual message-conveying quality. His "Scotch" symphony may not have so pointedly illustrated the activities of shop, street and park as Debussy's "Iberia," but it told something of the dignity of life; and it may be as well worth taking down from the shelf and rereading now and then as the modern work with its illustrative detail about men's busy morning, noon and night doings.

ADVERTISER
APRIL 4.

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

CARL FLESCH SOLOIST IN BRAHMS CONCERTO

Mendelssohn's Best Symphony, the Scotch, Feature of the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn	Scotch Symphony
Brahms	Violin Concerto
	Soloist, Carl Flesch.
Debussy	"Iberia" Images pour Orchestre, No. 2

In the midst of all our modern tonal troubles Mendelssohn did not seem so very old-fashioned. His Scotch Symphony was refreshing and recreative in almost every part. Only the slow movement seems a trifle too sentimental in these sterner and more ascetic days. The Scherzo remains a gem among symphonic movements. Mendelssohn was the prince of Scherzo composers, catching up the true humor and daintiness of this movement as no other composer has done, and the Scherzo of the Scotch symphony is the best among his excellent scherzos.

Unusual in its form, it gives a pretty rondo shape, its 2/4 rhythm suits well to the Scotch subject it portrays. It was not given to many German composers to catch the Scotch lilt, although they almost all tried it. Beethoven un-Scotched all the Gaelic folk-songs that he ever set; Franz made German Lieder out of Burns' poems; Bruch showed a skill in developing "Scots wha' hae" and "The Campbells are Comin'" that was a thousand miles away from Edinburgh or Aberdeen. Only Mendelssohn catches the true Scotch spirit and nowhere better than in the second movement of this symphony.

The symphony deserves the title of "Clarinette Symphony" far more than Mozart's E-flat symphony, for, although the latter was the first symphony to use the instrument, still the glory of the clarinette was not revealed until Mendelssohn used it in this work, and Weber in "Der Freischuetz." Both composers had the advantage of the intimate friendship of the greatest clarinettist of the world, the grandfather of the late Prof. Carl Baermann, which may account for their splendid use of the instrument.

The manner in which Mendelssohn uses the spectral color of the deep register (Chalumeau) of the A clarinette is masterly, and the instrument is in the foreground in every movement except the Adagio. In the introduction its melancholy is striking, its more genial middle register is employed in the Scherzo, and there is nothing finer than the duet just at the beginning of the final Coda, a graphic picture of loneliness and pensive sadness.

Let those who shrug their shoulders at Mendelssohn try to equal some of these touches. The instrument was well played in this performance and the clarinettists deserve all credit.

The very suave and Chesterfieldian sorrow expressed in the Adagio is Mendelssohn at his weakest. We can imagine the British public going wild over this in the early Victorian epoch, and can also imagine their scorn at Schumann who wrote so differently. The symphony was played yesterday afternoon in a continuous manner, as Mendelssohn desired it to be given. It was greatly applauded. There must be, at the Boston Symphony Concerts, a new generation of concert-goers to whom these old classics come as new.

Whether giving the symphony without pause between the movements is an advantage is doubtful, even though the composer desired it to be played thus. The Coda of the first movement,—"The Storm,"—makes a good climax and ending, even if it is not one of the great tempests in music. The final Coda (of the last movement) is the weakest point in the Symphony, a perfect "Mother-song" kind of an ending. Yet in spite of this there was great applause, for the beauties of the work far outweighed the defects.

The Brahms Concerto for violin is one of the master's more abstruse works. One recognizes the great technical difficulties and also the great ingenuity of construction displayed, but one does not become enthusiastic at any stage of the first movement, as one might over the Bruch or the Mendelssohn violin concerto. Of course, compared with the Beethoven violin concerto all the later works in this field shrivel up. But the Brahms Concerto is so difficult and so classical that it is always a stamp of great virtuosity and musicianship to conquer it, and many artists seek this "cachet."

Mr. Carl Flesch won this distinction, and the applause which followed the end of the work was more a tribute to his great ability than a testimony to the enjoyment of the work itself; it was a tribute to the thousand natural gifts that Flesch is heir to, for Mr. Flesch is certainly to be ranked with the great ones upon his instrument. The cadenzas revealed a fine virtuoso, while the other portions of the work showed a thorough musician. Surety and great breadth, perfect intonation and splendid freedom of bowing, all these were in Mr. Flesch's work. The first long cadenza was unfamiliar to us. It seemed somewhat too extended, but the excellent performance condoned this fault.

The work has the advantage of growing better as it proceeds. The opening movement is rather learned than inspired, while the finale, with its flavor of Hungarian folk songs, is very attractive. The energy with which this finale was given made it a fine climax and Mr. Flesch won numerous recalls.

We have had the "Images" which Debussy has brought us from Spain a couple of times before and the third time fails to reconcile us to them. Almost the only works of Debussy which we can grow enthusiastic over are "Pelleas and Melisande" (with certain reservations), and his many beautiful piano sketches. But generally, in his large forms, we grow tired of his mannerisms and we often fail to catch his impressionist effects. The fault may be our own, but the confession may stand. The Images were full of constant surprises, but after many similar jolts we failed to be surprised at any sudden and unheard-of modulations that might occur. There was a noticeable exodus after the end of the Brahms Concerto.

BOSTON HERALD.
APRIL 4.

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Carl Flesch Heard Here for the First Time—"Scotch" Symphony Played.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Carl Flesch was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A minor "Scotch"	Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin	Brahms
Iberia	Debussy

Until yesterday afternoon no symphony by Mendelssohn has been performed at one of these concerts since February, 1909, and the "Scotch" symphony was then played in commemoration of the composers' 100th birthday. We read not long ago in the Daily Telegraph of London the following astonishing statement: "As the years roll on the name of Mendelssohn appears less and less frequently on our concert programs. Its almost complete disappearance may be only a question of time." This statement is "astonishing." for if there is any city where Mendelssohn has been put on a pedestal and reverenced it is London. Was not Mendelssohn a friend of Victoria and the Prince Consort? Did he not write agreeable letters and sketch neatly but no better than a gentleman should? Was he not above all "a moral man," like Werther, moral to the point of priggishness?

That Mendelssohn's works should wholly disappear from the concert room would be a pity, for a few of them have certain fine qualities. He had the gift of suggesting romantic scenery by his music, as in the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and pages of the "Scotch" symphony. His workmanship is almost always excellent. There is a certain elegance in his easy and sure achievements, and this elegance gilds the more vapid pieces. M. d'Indy looks on him with a racial and disapproving eye. Admitting his genuine musical aptitude, his absolute knowledge, his uncommon faculty of assimilation, he denies him invention; and he finds these good qualities and this failing common among the Hebrew composers: "Always skilled in appropriating to themselves the knowledge of others, they are almost never true artists by nature." Not content with this, M. d'Indy notes the fact that Mendelssohn with David and Schumann founded "the celebrated Conservatory of Leipsic, which has since assisted so efficaciously in paralyzing the progress of musical art in Germany."

And yet the symphony gave much pleasure yesterday to the audience. No doubt the brilliance and the euphony of the performance had much to do with this. Dr. Muck and the orchestra almost persuaded us that Mendelssohn, after all that has been said against him, and in spite of the twaddle in his behalf—"Charles Auchester," for example—is really high up and secure of his place among the immortals. The introduction seemed impressive. The polish in the workmanship of the Allegro was fresh and glossy; we almost forgot the whining sentimentalism of the second theme; the storm was something more than Scotch mist. The Scherzo, which, taken at a very rapid tempo, was played with remarkable clearness, as only this virtuoso orchestra can play, is Mendelssohn at his best. The glitter is not pinchbeck. There is gentlemanly animation, and too often Mendelssohn was only genteel. Let us pass over the Adagio, which might have been originally any Song Without Words for the fireside. The Finale has more backbone. But what was Mendelssohn thinking of when he wrote the vulgar apotheosis? The tune itself is of the English street music-Milton Welling's ballad order. The treatment makes the inanity only the more glaring.

Mr. Flesch played here for the first time. Taught in Vienna, he went to Paris, studied laboriously at the Conservatory, where he took a first prize; but his present style does not reveal the qualities of the best French school. What did he do to himself during the 20 years after he took his prize? He is a highly respectable, sincere, worthy violinist; without a commanding or persuasive personality; without the faculty of communicating an emotion if he himself feels one. It is true that he played Brahms's concerto. For this reason some will describe him as a thoughtful, intellectual violinist; some will respect him the more because he chose it for his first appearance here, and praise him because he did not select "an ear-tickling," immoral concerto. We have heard violinists that rose above Brahms's music when they played it, who made it seem for the moment human and emotional. Mr. Flesch is not among them. Yesterday he was recalled several times.

Debussy's "Iberia" was played at these concerts in 1911, but the audience yesterday heard Debussy's music for the first time. Mr. Fiedler appreciated the rhythmic complexities, the subtle suggestions, the gorgeous coloring, but he was so lost in admiration that when he came to interpret the music its exquisite poetry too often was reduced to pedestrian prose. Rhythms and melodic figures were strangely altered. Hints at Spanish dances and festal music were swollen to bill-board proclamations. Yesterday there were impressionistic pictures of the orientalized Spain. And surely the second section, "The Odorous Night," is one of the most beautiful compositions in modern music. By modern, we mean since the time of Beethoven's "Eroica"; and yet there are pages of Bach, Domenico-Scarlatti and Couperin that even in 1914 may be reckoned as ultra-modern.

The program of the concerts next week will include Clapp's Symphony in E minor (MS. First performance) and the first suite from Bizet's music to "L'Ardlesienne."

BOSTON JOURNAL-
APRIL 4.

VIOLINIST MAKES SYMPHONY DEBUT

Carl Flesch Shares Honors With Dr. Muck and Orchestra.

A new violinist from Europe, Carl Flesch by name, was introduced to Bostonians at the Symphony concert yesterday. He proved to be a capable musician, if not an extraordinary virtuoso—a violinist of sound taste and technique, with a tone generally pleasing but never thrilling. Consequently, there was not a memorable performance of the Brahms' concerto, although it was like an echo of the familiar seventh heaven to hear the wood wind choir sing the opening measures of the romanza forming the second movement.

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, who won many prizes at the Paris Conservatoire, and who has been honored as teacher and soloist in various European capitals, was deservedly applauded for his excellent playing. The cadenza that he introduced in the first movement was well designed to show the brilliancy of his technique, and at the same time the pale beauty of his style. The concerto is a charming composition, offering as many opportunities to the orchestra as to the soloist, and on this account it is always welcome.

The concert opened with a beautiful performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," a composition inspired in part by the memory of Queen Mary and dedicated to Queen Victoria. Dr. Muck, after bowing himself for several minutes, had the orchestra stand up to pay its asknowledgments to the enthusiastic audience.

The final number on this week's program, which will be heard again tonight, is one of the Debussy tone pictures, "Iberia."

Next week the orchestra will give a first performance of a symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, who was born in Boston and who now teaches at the Middlesex School in Concord.

The other number will be Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne Suite."

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 4, 1914

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REHEARSAL

Mendelssohn Played as Wished—Flesch Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert of uncommon interest was that of yesterday afternoon—the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, in Symphony

MONITOR,
APRIL 4, 1914

Soloist at Symphony Concert Applauded for His Reading of German Composer's Piece for Violin With Orchestra

MENDELSSOHN HEARD

Appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the twentieth public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the viol[illegible], presented the Brahms' concerto in [illegible]r for violin and orches[illegible] in D ma[illegible] won the hearty applause of the large audience. The solo number was preceded by the Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony in A minor, and followed by the Debussy tone poem, "Iberia."

Mr. Flesch is an unusual type of orchestral soloist. He belongs neither among the artists who go out for popular favor nor among those who set themselves up as high academic authorities. He has none of the ways of the performer who brings the throngs up to the platform after the concert is over. And he has none of the bearing of the artist who assumes to give the last word of interpretation from European studios. He comes before his house to present composers for precisely what they are worth as recorders of the sentiment and the manners of their times. He puts no different value on a piece of orchestral music with a solo part than he would put on one without it. The Brahms concerto to him is Brahms making a picture of German life in the seventies, just what any other composition of Brahms in the same epoch would be. No fictitious value whatever is attached to the music because it happens to contain a part in which he can show off a violin of beautiful tone or display an execution of astonishing smoothness.

The soloist of the twentieth rehearsal was like a man of the orchestra itself in declaring the Brahms sentiment. He was as much a part of the organization of tone-makers that Dr. Muck directs as was Mr. Witek when he appeared in the middle of the season in the Tschaikowsky concerto. But there was one difference between the circumstances under which Mr. Flesch played and those under which Dr. Muck's concertmaster left the first desk of the violins and came forward as soloist. The visitor of Friday was held back by the orchestra. The first violinist of the orchestra when he made his appearance had all his associate artists with him urging him ahead.

The Flesch interpretation of the Brahms concerto was a great performance on the expressive side. It could not be, as was the Witek interpretation of the Tschaikowsky concerto, a greater performance on the mechanical side. Seldom does the man at the front of the platform give Dr. Muck's baton such a task as Mr. Flesch gave it. But that does not change the essential situation. The soloist just the same was a part of the organization with which he played. The only difference of purpose between him and the conductor was as to the time at which certain passages ought to go. Mr. Flesch was inclined at times to speed. Dr. Muck was inclined at all times to moderation. Dr. Muck thinks that notes, even in the accompanying part to a concerto were written to be played, not to be skipped over. That is a small point, perhaps, but soloists who visit Boston must understand it.

Mendelssohn, the despised composer of the present epoch of melodic and harmonic freedom, made a good showing in actual message-conveying quality. His "Scotch" symphony may not have so pointedly illustrated the activities of shop, street and park as Debussy's "Iberia," but it told something of the dignity of life; and it may be as well worth taking down from the shelf and rereading now and then as the modern work with its illustrative detail about men's busy morning, noon and night doings.

* * *

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 4,

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

CARL FLESCH SOLOIST IN BRAHMS CONCERTO

Mendelssohn's Best Symphony, the Scotch, Feature of the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn........................Scotch Symphony
Brahms..........................Violin Concerto
Soloist, Carl Flesch.
Debussy..."Iberia" Images pour Orchestre, No. 2

In the midst of all our modern tonal troubles Mendelssohn did not seem so very old-fashioned. His Scotch Symphony was refreshing and recreative in almost every part. Only the slow movement seems a trifle too sentimental in these sterner and more ascetic days. The Scherzo remains a gem among symphonic movements. Mendelssohn was the prince of Scherzo composers, catching up the true humor and daintiness of this movement as no other composer has done, and the Scherzo of the Scotch symphony is the best among his excellent scherzos.

Unusual in its form, it gives a pretty rondo shape, its 2/4 rhythm suits well to the Scotch subject it portrays. It was not given to many German composers to catch the Scotch lilt, although they almost all tried it. Beethoven un-Scotched all the Gaelic folk-songs that he ever set; Franz made German Lieder out of Burns' poems; Bruch showed a skill in developing "Scots wha' hae" and "The Campbells are Comin'" that was a thousand miles away from Edinburgh or Aberdeen. Only Mendelssohn catches the true Scotch spirit and nowhere better than in the second movement of this symphony.

The symphony deserves the title of "Clarinette Symphony" far more than Mozart's E-flat symphony, for, although the latter was the first symphony to use the instrument, still the glory of the clarinette was not revealed until Mendelssohn used it in this work, and Weber in "Der Freischuetz." Both composers had the advantage of the intimate friendship of the greatest clarinettist of the world, the grandfather of the late Prof. Carl Baermann, which may account for their splendid use of the instrument.

The manner in which Mendelssohn uses the spectral color of the deep register (Chalumeau) of the A clarinette is masterly, and the instrument is in the foreground in every movement except the Adagio. In the introduction its melancholy is striking, its more genial middle register is employed in the Scherzo, and there is nothing finer than the duet just at the beginning of the final Coda, a graphic picture of loneliness and pensive sadness.

Let those who shrug their shoulders at Mendelssohn try to equal some of these touches. The instrument was well played in this performance and the clarinettists deserve all credit.

The very suave and Chesterfieldian sorrow expressed in the Adagio is Mendelssohn at his weakest. We can imagine the British public going wild over this in the early Victorian epoch, and can also imagine their scorn at Schumann who wrote so differently. The symphony was played yesterday afternoon in a continuous manner, as Mendelssohn desired it to be given. It was greatly applauded. There must be, at the Boston Symphony Concerts, a new generation of concert-goers to whom these old classics come as new.

Whether giving the symphony without pause between the movements is an advantage is doubtful, even though the composer desired it to be played thus. The Coda of the first movement,—"The Storm,"—makes a good climax and ending, even if it is not one of the great tempests in music. The final Coda (of the last movement) is the weakest point in the Symphony, a perfect "Mother-song" kind of an ending. Yet in spite of this there was great applause, for the beauties of the work far outweighed the defects.

The Brahms Concerto for violin is one of the master's more abstruse works. One recognizes the great technical difficulties and also the great ingenuity of construction displayed, but one does not become enthusiastic at any stage of the first movement, as one might over the Bruch or the Mendelssohn violin concerto. Of course, compared with the Beethoven violin concerto all the later works in this field shrivel up. But the Brahms Concerto is so difficult and so classical that it is always a stamp of great virtuosity and musicianship to conquer it, and many artists seek this "cachet."

Mr. Carl Flesch won this distinction, and the applause which followed the end of the work was more a tribute to his great ability than a testimony to the enjoyment of the work itself; it was a tribute to the thousand natural gifts that Flesch is heir to, for Mr. Flesch is certainly to be ranked with the great ones upon his instrument. The cadenzas revealed a fine virtuoso, while the other portions of the work showed a thorough musician. Surety and great breadth, perfect intonation and splendid freedom of bowing, all these were in Mr. Flesch's work. The first long cadenza was unfamiliar to us. It seemed somewhat too extended, but the excellent performance condoned this fault.

The work has the advantage of growing better as it proceeds. The opening movement is rather learned than inspired, while the finale, with its flavor of Hungarian folk songs, is very attractive. The energy with which this finale was given made it a fine climax and Mr. Flesch won numerous recalls.

We have had the "Images" which Debussy has brought us from Spain a couple of times before and the third time fails to reconcile us to them. Almost the only works of Debussy which we can grow enthusiastic over are "Pelleas and Melisande" (with certain reservations), and his many beautiful piano sketches But generally, in his large forms, we grow tired of his mannerisms and we often fail to catch his impressionist effects. The fault may be our own, but the confession may stand. The Images were full of constant surprises, but after many similar jolts we failed to be surprised at any sudden and unheard-of modulations that might occur. There was a noticeable exodus after the end of the Brahms Concerto.

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 4.

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Carl Flesch Heard Here for the First Time—"Scotch" Symphony Played.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Carl Flesch was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A minor "Scotch"....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin........................Brahms
Iberia....................................Debussy

Until yesterday afternoon no symphony by Mendelssohn has been performed at one of these concerts since February, 1909, and the "Scotch" symphony was then played in commemoration of the composers' 100th birthday. We read not long ago in the Daily Telegraph of London the following astonishing statement: "As the years roll on the name of Mendelssohn appears less and less frequently on our concert programs. Its almost complete disappearance may be only a question of time." This statement is "astonishing." for if there is any city where Mendelssohn has been put on a pedestal and reverenced it is London. Was not Mendelssohn a friend of Victoria and the Prince Consort? Did he not write agreeable letters and sketch neatly but no better than a gentleman should? Was he not above all "a moral man," like Werther, moral to the point of priggishness?

That Mendelssohn's works should wholly disappear from the concert room would be a pity, for a few of them have certain fine qualities. He had the gift of suggesting romantic scenery by his music, as in the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and pages of the "Scotch" symphony. His workmanship is almost always excellent. There is a certain elegance in his easy and sure achievements, and this elegance gilds the more vapid pieces. M. d'Indy looks on him with a racial and disapproving eye. Admitting his genuine musical aptitude, his absolute knowledge, his uncommon faculty of assimilation, he denies him invention; and he finds these good qualities and this failing common among the Hebrew composers: "Always skilled in appropriating to themselves the knowledge of others, they are almost never true artists by nature." Not content with this, M. d'Indy notes the fact that Mendelssohn with David and Schumann founded "the celebrated Conservatory of Leipsic, which has since assisted so efficaciously in paralyzing the progress of musical art in Germany."

And yet the symphony gave much pleasure yesterday to the audience. No doubt the brilliance and the euphony of the performance had much to do with this. Dr. Muck and the orchestra almost persuaded us that Mendelssohn, after all that has been said against him, and in spite of the twaddle in his behalf—"Charles Auchester," for example—is really high up and secure of his place among the immortals. The introduction seemed impressive. The polish in the workmanship of the Allegro was fresh and glossy; we almost forgot the whining sentimentalism of the second theme; the storm was something more than Scotch mist. The Scherzo, which, taken at a very rapid tempo, was played with remarkable clearness, as only this virtuoso orchestra can play, is Mendelssohn at his best. The glitter is not pinchbeck. There is gentlemanly animation, and too often Mendelssohn was only genteel. Let us pass over the Adagio, which might have been originally any Song Without Words for the fireside. The Finale has more backbone. But what was Mendelssohn thinking of when he wrote the vulgar apotheosis? The tune itself is of the English street music-Milton Welling's ballad order. The treatment makes the inanity only the more glaring.

Mr. Flesch played here for the first time. Taught in Vienna, he went to Paris, studied laboriously at the Conservatory, where he took a first prize; but his present style does not reveal the qualities of the best French school. What did he do to himself during the 20 years after he took his prize? He is a highly respectable, sincere, worthy violinist; without a commanding or persuasive personality; without the faculty of communicating an emotion if he himself feels one. It is true that he played Brahms's concerto. For this reason some will describe him as a thoughtful, intellectual violinist; some will respect him the more because he chose it for his first appearance here, and praise him because he did not select "an ear-tickling," immoral concerto. We have heard violinists that rose above Brahms's music when they played it, who made it seem for the moment human and emotional. Mr. Flesch is not among them. Yesterday he was recalled several times.

Debussy's "Iberia" was played at these concerts in 1911, but the audience yesterday heard Debussy's music for the first time. Mr. Fiedler appreciated the rhythmic complexities, the subtle suggestions, the gorgeous coloring, but he was so lost in admiration that when he came to interpret the music its exquisite poetry too often was reduced to pedestrian prose. Rhythms and melodic figures were strangely altered. Hints at Spanish dances and festal music were swollen to bill-board proclamations. Yesterday there were impressionistic pictures of the orientalized Spain. And surely the second section, "The Odorous Night," is one of the most beautiful compositions in modern music. By modern, we mean since the time of Beethoven's "Eroica"; and yet there are pages of Bach, Domenico-Scarlatti and Couperin that even in 1914 may be reckoned as ultra-modern.

The program of the concerts next week will include Clapp's Symphony in E minor (MS. First performance) and the first suite from Bizet's music to "L'Ardlesienne."

BOSTON JOURNAL-

APRIL 4,

VIOLINIST MAKES SYMPHONY DEBUT

Carl Flesch Shares Honors With Dr. Muck and Orchestra.

A new violinist from Europe, Carl Flesch by name, was introduced to Bostonians at the Symphony concert yesterday. He proved to be a capable musician, if not an extraordinary virtuoso—a violinist of sound taste and technique, with a tone generally pleasing but never thrilling. Consequently, there was not a memorable performance of the Brahms' concerto, although it was like an echo of the familiar seventh heaven to hear the wood wind choir sing the opening measures of the romanza forming the second movement.

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, who won many prizes at the Paris Conservatoire, and who has been honored as teacher and soloist in various European capitals, was deservedly applauded for his excellent playing. The cadenza that he introduced in the first movement was well designed to show the brilliancy of his technique, and at the same time the pale beauty of his style. The concerto is a charming composition, offering as many opportunities to the orchestra as to the soloist, and on this account it is always welcome.

The concert opened with a beautiful performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," a composition inspired in part by the memory of Queen Mary and dedicated to Queen Victoria. Dr. Muck, after bowing himself for several minutes, had the orchestra stand up to pay its asknowledgments to the enthusiastic audience.

The final number on this week's program, which will be heard again tonight, is one of the Debussy tone pictures, "Iberia."

Next week the orchestra will give a first performance of a symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, who was born in Boston and who now teaches at the Middlesex School in Concord.

The other number will be Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne Suite."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 4, 1914

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REHEARSAL

Mendelssohn Played as Wished—Flesch Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert of uncommon interest was that of yesterday afternoon—the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, in Symphony Hall. Carl Flesch, violinist, making his

[15]

...orchestral pieces were the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn, which Dr. Muck played, according to the wishers of the composer, without a pause between the movements, and the "Iberia" of Debussy, the second of the "Images" for orchestra.

VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Of the later work there was a remarkable performance. Indeed, the first movement, "Par les rues et par less chemins," had never been given so appreciatively and so effectively in this city. As much was hardly true of the middle movement, "Les parfums de nuit," as we conceive the piece after several hearings. This movement we found to be played too clearly.

Every single note in the score was heard and it is possible not to see the forest for the trees. There was for us the effect of detached episodes, rather than continuous thought. Now, the means that Debussy employs to express his impression of the night are, in themselves, episodic—little detached phrases in the rhythm, principally of the Spanish Habanera, and somewhat of the character of a serenade. But this piece is surely not intended as a musical mosaic. It is intended to convey an impression of the magical, odorous night, an impression to be suggestive to the senses and the imagination, without the thought of literality.

The means by which Debussy sought to achieve his effect were thoroughly exposed, but for us the effect itself was lost in the exposition. And of all music, this late orchestral work of Debussy, an extreme of impressionism, benefits least by such treatment. The movement has had more atmosphere, and more sympathetic, if not more comprehending interpretation. On the other hand, Debussy's aural photography, as it might almost be called, of the sounds heard "in the streets and waysides" and "on the morning of a festal day," which is absolutely marvellous (for no musical impressionist had before Debussy developed such an amazing technic for the capturing and translating into beautiful tone of beautiful sounds) was made even more so by the exceptionally vivid performance. As a score, from at least a technical point of view, this is one of the wonders of the musical world. In rhythmic effects, in an individual unstanding of the orchestra in wholly Debussy here yields place to no man. We remember a remark of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's: "If you could hear the grass grow, Debussy would have set it to music."

Mr. Flesch an Artist

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, holds deservedly the reputation of one of the greatest violinists of the day. He chose to play in Boston a serious work which is constantly meeting with more of the recognition it deserves. Mr. Flesch may have been a little nervous yesterday, but he made a strong impression by the breadth and virility of his style, his magnificent tone and his unusual sense of the proportions of the concerto. For he interpreted not merely as a gifted soloist, but with a very evident knowledge and appreciation of the symphonic character of the work, and the entrance of his solo was not the entrance of a conquering virtuoso, but of another instrument in the great ensemble. It continued and further developed the big lines of the work; it carried out and completed the thought of the composer. The interpretation was a manly one; it was free from sentimentality, while it was nobly emotional. This concerto is not the place, indeed, for fireworks, but the first movement and the finale were played with healthy fire. And Dr. Muck's accompaniment was again a feature of the performance. The audience applauded heartily a great artist who had played the more effectively as he proceeded.

Mendelssohn's Symphony

The fact that Mendelssohn desired his symphony to be played through without pauses is not the only proof of the generally romantic quality of the work, and of the desire, felt strongly by composers of Mendelssohn's period, to attain greater and greater unity of effect. Liszt was soon at work on his symphonic poems. The A minor symphony is less original, perhaps, and less prophetic, than the greater of Liszt's orchestral works, but to most of us the admirable performance was a great pleasure, despite the pervading sentimentality of the slow movement and the Moody and Sankey character of concluding measures. This symph is beautifully written, and while young gentlemen of today may fe little impatient with it, it is neve less truth, that neither Mr. Mahl his hour long symphony in C sharp nor, nor Mr. Richard Strauss, ing Nietzchean struggles of the nor yet Mr. Debussy of Iberia, more sincere in their day. The si ity of this work, in fact, is one charms. Another is the instrum tion of the first and second ments. A third is the delightful zo, so brilliantly played. The aud applauded Mendelssohn, too, and orchestra, at the bidding of the ductor, rose to share the applau

---

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 4, 1914.

FLESCH VIOLINIST OF THE FIRST RANK

Plays Brahms Concerto in First Time Here.

Dr Muck Revives "Scotch" Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

As soloist at the 20th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, whose reputation as a sterling artist in Europe had preceded him, played for the first time in Boston. Mr Flesch's performance of the Brahms concerto will be one of the significant events of this musical season, indeed of many seasons. Not within recent years has Europe sent to this country for a first hearing a violinist who combined in so high a degree the noblest attributes of virtuosity with those of the interpretative artist.'

Mr Flesch has not a prepossessing personality. In presence he scarcely could be called commanding. His manner during the long orchestral prelude denoted some nervousness, but once launched in his part, the man was forgotten and a new and absorbing personality arose out of his playing.

It would be impertinent to discuss matters of technic were Mr Flesch not a stranger. His feats are accomplished with the quiet but sovereign skill of the artist who possesses but subordinates the dexterity of the virtuoso. The double stop passages in octaves and sixths in the cadenza were impeccable in precision and intonation. The purity of the latter is an extraordinary trait in his playing. The very heart of the tonality is always touched. It may be that the peculiar brilliance of the quality of the artist's tone accounts in part for this, a brilliance of crystaline and penetrating transparency, and yet of abundant warmth and vitality, a tone which under the nuances of this bow can be as caressing as that of Mr Ysaye in his best estate, and also disclose the incisive, finely tempered intellectuality of Kreisler.

It is to be hoped not only that many of those who study the violin heard Mr Flesch either yesterday afternoon, or will hear him tonight, but those who study singing as well. The delicacy of shading, the constant ebb and flow of tone, the avoidance of barren, flat lines in dynamics, and the lyric impulse which he permits to sing broadly through a phrase, makes his playing of sustained song a thing of ravishing beauty. Nor should the clearness of his articulation be forgotten, nor his refusal, even in the boldest bravura in which he plays with true abandon and rhythmic verve, to force tone beyond the true capacity of his instrument.

Rhythmically, Mr Flesch has a birthright not given to the average European. The wild spirit of the Hungarian dance controlled into an emotional force of tremendous vitality courses through all that he does. There were his individual ideas as to tempo, but they never clouded, rather emphasized the emport of the passage, and Dr Muck was resourceful. Here is a violinist worthy to stand beside Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, an artist who employs a masterful musicianship to recreate the thought of the composer. Mr Flesch was received with the demonstration of favor which he deserved.

Following the concerto, Dr Muck revived Debussy's suite, "Iberia," which Mr Fiedler played several seasons ago. The work again was of interest as the speech of an impressionism employing the colors of the orchestra in the imagination and exotic tone painting of a genius. Dr Muck's interpretation of the second movement, "the odorous night," was a remarkable one, unerring in its sense of a continuity of thoughts, adjacent, yet irrelevant, reflecting the sweet chaos of the voices and perfumes of the night.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with its faded and obvious formulas, began the concert, the devices that sound trite to modern ears accustomed to less ingenuous things than the sentimental sixths, the pompous flourishes and the Scotch tunes. This may be said for Mendelssohn: he scored with a cunning hand and his work is clear and transparent. The symphony was played entire without pause. It was received with enthusiasm.

From BULLETIN

Address Providence, R. I.

MAR 25 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL

Appearing as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert, Famous Pianist Given Flattering Reception. — Orchestra Gives Excellent Programme.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17..................Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he ited for the opening bars to be played. dence there was of his recent ordeal the nervous hands that held themes in readiness to enter upon their k. But once the first note was struck ch of that dropped away.

rilliantly he played, and, as time lets one stand still, so Paderewski has aprently changed. What he has lost in fervency of youth, he has probably ned in maturity of judgment. At es last evening he played with much spiration and with great beauty of tone, hile at times, it must be confessed, he uched upon the fault, for which he was rshly criticized in the beginning of the son and played with over-much force. t is evident that with the years he as lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

So, too, must admiration be expressed for Dr. Muck as he played upon his ochestra, expressing through his players, his own individuality and interpretation of the composition, upon which Mr. Paderewski embroidered, with brilliancy, his

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment; again and again he grasped the conductor's hand, the concert-meister's hand and bowed further acknowledgment.

Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakespeare had his inspiration when he referred to the "little more than a little" that is "by much too much." So there were those in the audience that would have preferred to remember Paderewski's playing of his own concerto, than the encore, in which it must be confessed he showed a tendency to maltreat the piano. And yet, all gratitude should be expressed for his generosity after so brilliant a display.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From News

Address Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 25 1914

k, 1884

BIG RECEPTION GIVEN PADEREWSKI AT HIS CONCERT

Paderewski's presence in this city last evening as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra drew a large audience to Infantry hall.

Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra during the program, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36............................Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow. Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale.

For sheer beauty, the second number on the program, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrims' Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with delicacy and precision.

With the entrance of Paderewski came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordiality of his reception could have left him no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances here.

He played brilliantly. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance, following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment. Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last, after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one it was again seated.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 26 1914

, 1884

Inviting a Catastrophe.

Such shameful overcrowding as was witnessed at Infantry Hall on Tuesday night at the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should never again be permitted in this city. Every aisle was choked with people standing shoulder to shoulder, and every means of exit was entirely blocked, in violation of all safety and fire laws.

In spite of the changes forced on the Infantry Hall management some years ago, when large exits were cut on the east side of the auditorium, the place remains to-day little better than a fire trap of the most pronounced character, to say nothing of the absolute lack of ventilation which makes the air unfit for any human being to breathe whenever there is a large audience. When, in addition to these defects, conditions such as those of Tuesday night are allowed to exist, some speedy arrests are in order.

[152]

...ch naturalist, ... two schooners, ...

orchestral pieces were the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn, which Dr. Muck played, according to the wishers of the composer, without a pause between the movements, and the "Iberia" of Debussy, the second of the "Images" for orchestra.

VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Of the later work there was a remarkable performance. Indeed, the first movement, "Par les rues et par less chemins," had never been given so appreciatively and so effectively in this city. As much was hardly true of the middle movement, "Les parfums de nuit," as we conceive the piece after several hearings. This movement we found to be played too clearly.

Every single note in the score was heard and it is possible not to see the forest for the trees. There was for us the effect of detached episodes, rather than continuous thought. Now, the means that Debussy employs to express his impression of the night are, in themselves, episodic—little detached phrases in the rhythm, principally, of the Spanish Habanera, and somewhat of the character of a serenade. But this piece is surely not intended as a musical mosaic. It is intended to convey an impression of the magical, odorous night, an impression to be suggestive to the senses and the imagination, without the thought of literality.

The means by which Debussy sought to achieve his effect were thoroughly exposed, but for us the effect itself was lost in the exposition. And of all music, this late orchestral work of Debussy, an extreme of impressionism, benefits least by such treatment. The movement has had more atmosphere, and more sympathetic, if not more comprehending interpretation. On the other hand, Debussy's aural photography, as it might almost be called, of the sounds heard "in the streets and waysides" and "on the morning of a festal day," which is absolutely marvellous (for no musical impressionist had before Debussy developed such an amazing technic for the capturing and translating into beautiful tone of beautiful sounds) was made even more so by the exceptionally vivid performance. As a score, from at least a technical point of view, this is one of the wonders of the musical world. In rhythmic effects, in an individual unstanding of the orchestra in wholly Debussy here yields place to no man. We remember a remark of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's: "If you could hear the grass grow, Debussy would have set it to music."

Mr. Flesch an Artist

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, holds deservedly the reputation of one of the greatest violinists of the day. He chose to play in Boston a serious work which is constantly meeting with more of the recognition it deserves. Mr. Flesch may have been a little nervous yesterday, but he made a strong impression by the breadth and virility of his style, his magnificent tone and his unusual sense of the proportions of the concerto. For he interpreted not merely as a gifted soloist, but with a very evident knowledge and appreciation of the symphonic character of the work, and the entrance of his solo was not the entrance of a conquering virtuoso, but of another instrument in the great ensemble. It continued and further developed the big lines of the work; it carried out and completed the thought of the composer. The interpretation was a manly one; it was free from sentimentality, while it was nobly emotional. This concerto is not the place, indeed, for fireworks, but the first movement and the finale were played with healthy fire. And Dr. Muck's accompaniment was again a feature of the performance. The audience applauded heartily a great artist who had played the more effectively as he proceeded.

Mendelssohn's Symphony

The fact that Mendelssohn desired his symphony to be played through without pauses is not the only proof of the generally romantic quality of the work, and of the desire, felt strongly by composers of Mendelssohn's period, to attain greater and greater unity of effect. Liszt was soon at work on his symphonic poems. The A minor symphony is less original, perhaps, and less prophetic, than the greater of Liszt's orchestral works, but to most of us the admirable performance was a great pleasure, despite the pervading sentimentality of the slow movement and the Moody and Sankey character of concluding measures. This symph is beautifully written, and while s young gentlemen of today may fe little impatient with it, it is neve less truth, that neither Mr. Mahle his hour long symphony in C sharp nor, nor Mr. Richard Strauss, port ing Nietzchean struggles of the nor yet Mr. Debussy of Iberia, more sincere in their day. The si ity of this work, in fact, is one c charms. Another is the instrum tion of the first and second n ments. A third is the delightful s zo, so brilliantly played. The aud applauded Mendelssohn, too, and orchestra, at the bidding of the ductor, rose to share the applau

---

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 4, 1914.

FLESCH VIOLINIST OF THE FIRST RANK

Plays Brahms Concerto in First Time Here.

Dr Muck Revives "Scotch" Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

As soloist at the 20th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, whose reputation as a sterling artist in Europe had preceded him, played for the first time in Boston. Mr Flesch's performance of the Brahms concerto will be one of the significant events of this musical season, indeed of many seasons. Not within recent years has Europe sent to this country for a first hearing a violinist who combined in so high a degree the noblest attributes of virtuosity with those of the interpretative artist.

Mr Flesch has not a prepossessing personality. In presence he scarcely could be called commanding. His manner during the long orchestral prelude denoted some nervousness, but once launched in his part, the man was forgotten and a new and absorbing personality arose out of his playing.

It would be impertinent to discuss matters of technic were Mr Flesch not a stranger. His feats are accomplished with the quiet but sovereign skill of the artist who possesses but subordinates the dexterity of the virtuoso. The double stop passages in octaves and sixths in the cadenza were impeccable in precision and intonation. The purity of the latter is an extraordinary trait in his playing. The very heart of the tonality is always touched. It may be that the peculiar brilliance of the quality of the artist's tone accounts in part for this, a brilliance of crystaline and penetrating transparency, and yet of abundant warmth and vitality, a tone which under the nuances of this bow can be as caressing as that of Mr Ysaye in his best estate, and also disclose the incisive, finely tempered intellectuality of Kreisler.

It is to be hoped not only that many of those who study the violin heard Mr Flesch either yesterday afternoon, or will hear him tonight, but those who study singing as well. The delicacy of shading, the constant ebb and flow of tone, the avoidance of barren, flat lines in dynamics, and the lyric impulse which he permits to sing broadly through a phrase, makes his playing of sustained song a thing of ravishing beauty. Nor should the clearness of his articulation be forgotten, nor his refusal, even in the boldest bravura in which he plays with true abandon and rhythmic verve, to force tone beyond the true capacity of his instrument.

Rhythmically, Mr Flesch has a birthright not given to the average European. The wild spirit of the Hungarian dance controlled into an emotional force of tremendous vitality courses through all that he does. There were his individual ideas as to tempo, but they never clouded, rather emphasized the emport of the passage, and Dr Muck was resourceful. Here is a violinist worthy to stand beside Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, an artist who employs a masterful musicianship to recreate the thought of the composer. Mr Flesch was received with the demonstration of favor which he deserved.

Following the concerto, Dr Muck revived Debussy's suite, "Iberia," which Mr Fiedler played several seasons ago. The work again was of interest as the speech of an impressionism employing the colors of the orchestra in the imagination and exotic tone painting of a genius. Dr Muck's interpretation of the second movement, "the odorous night," was a remarkable one, unerring in its sense of a continuity of thoughts, adjacent, yet irrelevant, reflecting the sweet chaos of the voices and perfumes of the night.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with its faded and obvious formulas, began the concert, the devices that sound trite to modern ears accustomed to less ingenuous things than the sentimental sixths, the pompous flourishes and the Scotch tunes. This may be said for Mendelssohn: he scored with a cunning hand and his work is clear and transparent. The symphony was played entire without pause. It was received with enthusiasm.

From BULLE
Address Providence, R. I.
MAR 25 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL

Appearing as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert, Famous Pianist Given Flattering Reception.—Orchestra Gives Excellent Programme.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphany No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17....................Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to havo been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he ited for the opening bars to be played. dence there was of his recent ordeal the nervous hands that held themves in readiness to enter upon their k. But once the first note was struck ch of that dropped away.

rilliantly he played, and, as time lets one stand still, so Paderewski has aprently changed. What he has lost in fervency of youth, he has probably ned in maturity of judgment. At nes last evening he played with much spiration and with great beauty of tone, hile at times, it must be confessed, he uched upon the fault, for which he was rshly criticized in the beginning of the ason and played with over-much force. t is evident that with the years he as lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

So, too, must admiration be expressed for Dr. Muck as he played upon his ochestra, expressing through his players, his own individuality and interpretation of the composition upon which Mr. Paderewski embroidered, with equal brilliancy, his o added to its v brilliancy

Again and again the audience r him at the close of the performa following enthusiastic bursts af applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment; again and again he grasped the conductor's hand, the concert-meister's hand and bowed further acknowledgment.

Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakespeare had his inspiration when he referred to the "little more than a little" that is "by much too much." So there were those in the audience that would have preferred to remember Paderewski's playing of his own concerto, than the encore, in which it must be confessed he showed a tendency to maltreat the piano. And yet, all gratitude should be expressed for his generosity after so brilliant a display.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From News
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25

BIG RECEPTION GIVEN PADEREWSKI AT HIS CONCERT

Paderewski's presence in this city last evening as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra drew a large audience to Infantry hall.

Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra during the program, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36...... .... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow. Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale.

For sheer beauty, the second number on the program, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrims' Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with delicacy and precision.

With the entrance of Paderewski came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordiality of his reception could have left him no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances here.

He played brilliantly. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance, following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgement. Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last, after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one it was again seated.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 26 1914

Inviting a Catastrophe.

Such shameful overcrowding as was witnessed at Infantry Hall on Tuesday night at the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should never again be permitted in this city. Every aisle was choked with people standing shoulder to shoulder, and every means of exit was entirely blocked, in violation of all safety and fire laws.

In spite of the changes forced on the Infantry Hall management some years ago, when large exits were cut on the east side of the auditorium, the place remains to-day little better than a fire trap of the most pronounced character, to say nothing of the absolute lack of ventilation which makes the air unfit for any human being to breathe whenever there is a large audience. When, in addition to these defects, conditions such as those of Tuesday night are allowed to exist, some speedy arrests are in order.

Cuvier's, the great French naturalist

The orchestral pieces were the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn, which Dr. Muck played, according to the wishes of the composer, without a pause between the movements, and the "Iberia" of Debussy, the second of the "Images" for orchestra.

VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Of the later work there was a remarkable performance. Indeed, the first movement, "Par les rues et par less chemins," had never been given so appreciatively and so effectively in this city. As much was hardly true of the middle movement, "Les parfums de nuit," as we conceive the piece after several hearings. This movement we found to be played too clearly.

Every single note in the score was heard and it is possible not to see the forest for the trees. There was for us the effect of detached episodes, rather than continuous thought. Now, the means that Debussy employs to express his impression of the night are, in themselves, episodic—little detached phrases in the rhythm, principally of the Spanish Habanera, and somewhat of the character of a serenade. But this piece is surely not intended as a musical mosaic. It is intended to convey an impression of the magical, odorous night, an impression to be suggestive to the senses and the imagination, without the thought of literality.

The means by which Debussy sought to achieve his effect were thoroughly exposed, but for us the effect itself was lost in the exposition. And of all music, this late orchestral work of Debussy, an extreme of impressionism, benefits least by such treatment. The movement has had more atmosphere, and more sympathetic, if not more comprehending interpretation. On the other hand, Debussy's aural photography, as it might almost be called, of the sounds heard "in the streets and waysides" and "on the morning of a festal day," which is absolutely marvellous (for no musical impressionist had before Debussy developed such an amazing technic for the capturing and translating into beautiful tone of beautiful sounds) was made even more so by the exceptionally vivid performance. As a score, from at least a technical point of view, this is one of the wonders of the musical world. In rhythmic effects, in an individual unstanding of the orchestra in wholly Debussy here yields place to no man. We remember a remark of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's: "If you could hear the grass grow, Debussy would have set it to music."

Mr. Flesch an Artist

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, holds deservedly the reputation of one of the greatest violinists of the day. He chose to play in Boston a serious work which is constantly meeting with more of the recognition it deserves. Mr. Flesch may have been a little nervous yesterday, but he made a strong impression by the breadth and virility of his style, his magnificent tone and his unusual sense of the proportions of the concerto. For he interpreted not merely as a gifted soloist, but with a very evident knowledge and appreciation of the symphonic character of the work, and the entrance of his solo was not the entrance of a conquering virtuoso, but of another instrument in the great ensemble. It continued and further developed the big lines of the work; it carried out and completed the thought of the composer. The interpretation was a manly one; it was free from sentimentality, while it was nobly emotional. This concerto is not the place, indeed, for fireworks, but the first movement and the finale were played with healthy fire. And Dr. Muck's accompaniment was again a feature of the performance. The audience applauded heartily a great artist who had played the more effectively as he proceeded.

Mendelssohn's Symphony

The fact that Mendelssohn desired his symphony to be played through without pauses is not the only proof of the generally romantic quality of the work, and of the desire, felt strongly by composers of Mendelssohn's period, to attain greater and greater unity of effect. Liszt was soon at work on his symphonic poems. The A minor symphony is less original, perhaps, and less prophetic, than the greater of Liszt's orchestral works, but to most of us the admirable performance was a great pleasure, despite the pervading sentimentality of the slow movement and the Moody and Sankey character of the concluding measures. This symphony is beautifully written, and while some young gentlemen of today may feel a little impatient with it, it is nevertheless truth, that neither Mr. Mahler in his hour long symphony in C sharp minor, nor Mr. Richard Strauss, portraying Nietzchean struggles of the soul, nor yet Mr. Debussy of Iberia, were more sincere in their day. The sincerity of this work, in fact, is one of its charms. Another is the instrumentation of the first and second movements. A third is the delightful scherzo, so brilliantly played. The audience applauded Mendelssohn, too, and the orchestra, at the bidding of the conductor, rose to share the applause.

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 4, 1914.

FLESCH VIOLINIST OF THE FIRST RANK

Plays Brahms Concerto in First Time Here.

Dr Muck Revives "Scotch" Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

As soloist at the 20th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, whose reputation as a sterling artist in Europe had preceded him, played for the first time in Boston. Mr Flesch's performance of the Brahms concerto will be one of the significant events of this musical season, indeed of many seasons. Not within recent years has Europe sent to this country for a first hearing a violinist who combined in so high a degree the noblest attributes of virtuosity with those of the interpretative artist.

Mr Flesch has not a prepossessing personality. In presence he scarcely could be called commanding. His manner during the long orchestral prelude denoted some nervousness, but once launched in his part, the man was forgotten and a new and absorbing personality arose out of his playing.

It would be impertinent to discuss matters of technic were Mr Flesch not a stranger. His feats are accomplished with the quiet but sovereign skill of the artist who possesses but subordinates the dexterity of the virtuoso. The double stop passages in octaves and sixths in the cadenza were impeccable in precision and intonation. The purity of the latter is an extraordinary trait in his playing. The very heart of the tonality is always touched. It may be that the peculiar brilliance of the quality of the artist's tone accounts in part for this, a brilliance of crystaline and penetrating transparency, and yet of abundant warmth and vitality, a tone which under the nuances of this bow can be as caressing as that of Mr Ysaye in his best estate, and also disclose the incisive, finely tempered intellectuality of Kreisler.

It is to be hoped not only that many of those who study the violin heard Mr Flesch either yesterday afternoon, or will hear him tonight, but those who study singing as well. The delicacy of shading, the constant ebb and flow of tone, the avoidance of barren, flat lines in dynamics, and the lyric impulse which he permits to sing broadly through a phrase, makes his playing of sustained song a thing of ravishing beauty. Nor should the clearness of his articulation be forgotten, nor his refusal, even in the boldest bravura in which he plays with true abandon and rhythmic verve, to force tone beyond the true capacity of his instrument.

Rhythmically, Mr Flesch has a birthright not given to the average European. The wild spirit of the Hungarian dance controlled into an emotional force of tremendous vitality courses through all that he does. There were his individual ideas as to tempo, but they never clouded, rather emphasized the emport of the passage, and Dr Muck was resourceful. Here is a violinist worthy to stand beside Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, an artist who employs a masterful musicianship to recreate the thought of the composer. Mr Flesch was received with the demonstration of favor which he deserved.

Following the concerto, Dr Muck revived Debussy's suite, "Iberia," which Mr Fiedler played several seasons ago. The work again was of interest as the speech of an impressionism employing the colors of the orchestra in the imagination and exotic tone painting of a genius. Dr Muck's interpretation of the second movement, "the odorous night," was a remarkable one, unerring in its sense of a continuity of thoughts, adjacent, yet irrelevant, reflecting the sweet chaos of the voices and perfumes of the night.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with its faded and obvious formulas, began the concert, the devices that sound trite to modern ears accustomed to less ingenuous things than the sentimental sixths, the pompous flourishes and the Scotch tunes. This may be said for Mendelssohn; he scored with a cunning hand and his work is clear and transparent. The symphony was played entire without pause. It was received with enthusiasm.

JOURNAL

Providenc

ting a Catast

ameful overcrowd

at Infantry Hall o

he performance of th y Orchestra shou permitted in this city

as choked with people s er to shoulder, and every exit was entirely blocked, in on of all safety and fire laws.

In spite of the changes forced on the Infantry Hall management some years ago, when large exits were cut on the east side of the auditorium, the place remains to-day little better than a fire trap of the most pronounced character, to say nothing of the absolute lack of ventilation which makes the air unfit for any human being to breathe whenever there is a large audience. When, in addition to these defects, conditions such as those of Tuesday night are allowed to exist, some speedy arrests are in order.

From

Address Providence, R. I.

MAR 25 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL

Appearing as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert, Famous Pianist Given Flattering Reception.—Orchestra Gives Excellent Programme.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17..........................Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he waited for the opening bars to be played. Evidence there was of his recent ordeal in the nervous hands that held themselves in readiness to enter upon their task. But once the first note was struck much of that dropped away.

Brilliantly he played, and, as time lets no one stand still, so Paderewski has apparently changed. What he has lost in the fervency of youth, he has probably gained in maturity of judgment. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault, for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

So, too, must admiration be expressed for Dr. Muck as he played upon his orchestra, expressing through his players, his own individuality and interpretation of the composition, upon which Mr. Paderewski embroidered [illegible] brilliancy, his [illegible]

Again and again the audience r[illegible] him at the close of the performa[illegible] following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment; again and again he grasped the conductor's hand, the concert-meister's hand and bowed further acknowledgment.

Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakespeare had his inspiration when he referred to the "little more than a little" that is "by much too much." So there were those in the audience that would have preferred to remember Paderewski's playing of his own concerto, than the encore, in which it must be confessed he showed a tendency to maltreat the piano. And yet, all gratitude should be expressed for his generosity after so brilliant a display.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From News

Address Providence, R. I.

Date MAR 25 1914

k, 1884

BIG RECEPTION GIVEN PADEREWSKI AT HIS CONCERT

Paderewski's presence in this city last evening as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra drew a large audience to Infantry hall.

Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra during the program, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36...... .... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow. Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale.

For sheer beauty, the second number on the program, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrims' Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with delicacy and precision.

With the entrance of Paderewski came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordiality of his reception could have left him no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances here.

He played brilliantly. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance, following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment. Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last, after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one it was again seated.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

[152]

Cuvier, the great [illegible] naturalist, [illegible] schooners, [illegible] orchestral pieces were the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn, which Dr. Muck played, according to the wishes of the composer, without a pause between the movements, and the "Iberia" of Debussy, the second of the "Images" for orchestra.

VIRTUOSITY DISPLAYED

Of the later work there was a remarkable performance. Indeed, the first movement, "Par les rues et par less chemins," had never been given so appreciatively and so effectively in this city. As much was hardly true of the middle movement, "Les parfums de nuit," as we conceive the piece after several hearings. This movement we found to be played too clearly.

Every single note in the score was heard and it is possible not to see the forest for the trees. There was for us the effect of detached episodes, rather than continuous thought. Now, the means that Debussy employs to express his impression of the night are, in themselves, episodic—little detached phrases in the rhythm, principally, of the Spanish Habanera, and somewhat of the character of a serenade. But this piece is surely not intended as a musical mosaic. It is intended to convey an impression of the magical, odorous night, an impression to be suggestive to the senses and the imagination, without the thought of literality.

The means by which Debussy sought to achieve his effect were thoroughly exposed, but for us the effect itself was lost in the exposition. And of all music, this late orchestral work of Debussy, an extreme of impressionism, benefits least by such treatment. The movement has had more atmosphere, and more sympathetic, if not more comprehending interpretation. On the other hand, Debussy's aural photography, as it might almost be called, of the sounds heard "in the streets and waysides" and "on the morning of a festal day," which is absolutely marvellous (for no musical impressionist had before Debussy developed such an amazing technic for the capturing and translating into beautiful tone of beautiful sounds) was made even more so by the exceptionally vivid performance. As a score, from at least a technical point of view, this is one of the wonders of the musical world. In rhythmic effects, in an individual understanding of the orchestra in wholly Debussy here yields place to no man. We remember a remark of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's: "If you could hear the grass grow, Debussy would have set it to music."

Mr. Flesch an Artist

Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, holds deservedly the reputation of one of the greatest violinists of the day. He chose to play in Boston a serious work which is constantly meeting with more of the recognition it deserves. Mr. Flesch may have been a little nervous yesterday, but he made a strong impression by the breadth and virility of his style, his magnificent tone and his unusual sense of the proportions of the concerto. For he interpreted not merely as a gifted soloist, but with a very evident knowledge and appreciation of the symphonic character of the work, and the entrance of his solo was not the entrance of a conquering virtuoso, but of another instrument in the great ensemble. It continued and further developed the big lines of the work; it carried out and completed the thought of the composer. The interpretation was a manly one; it was free from sentimentality, while it was nobly emotional. This concerto is not the place, indeed, for fireworks, but the first movement and the finale were played with healthy fire. And Dr. Muck's accompaniment was again a feature of the performance. The audience applauded heartily a great artist who had played the more effectively as he proceeded.

Mendelssohn's Symphony

The fact that Mendelssohn desired his symphony to be played through without pauses is not the only proof of the generally romantic quality of the work, and of the desire, felt strongly by composers of Mendelssohn's period, to attain greater and greater unity of effect. Liszt was soon at work on his symphonic poems. The A minor symphony is less original, perhaps, and less prophetic, than the greater of Liszt's orchestral works, but to most of us the admirable performance was a great pleasure, despite the pervading sentimentality of the slow movement and the Moody and Sankey character of the concluding measures. This symphony is beautifully written, and while some young gentlemen of today may feel a little impatient with it, it is nevertheless truth, that neither Mr. Mahler in his hour long symphony in C sharp minor, nor Mr. Richard Strauss, portraying Nietzchean struggles of the soul, nor yet Mr. Debussy of Iberia, were more sincere in their day. The sincerity of this work, in fact, is one of its charms. Another is the instrumentation of the first and second movements. A third is the delightful scherzo, so brilliantly played. The audience applauded Mendelssohn, too, and the orchestra, at the bidding of the conductor, rose to share the applause.

BOSTON GLOBE
APRIL 4, 1914.

FLESCH VIOLINIST OF THE FIRST RANK

Plays Brahms Concerto in First Time Here.

Dr Muck Revives "Scotch" Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia."

As soloist at the 20th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, whose reputation as a sterling artist in Europe had preceded him, played for the first time in Boston. Mr Flesch's performance of the Brahms concerto will be one of the significant events of this musical season, indeed of many seasons. Not within recent years has Europe sent to this country for a first hearing a violinist who combined in so high a degree the noblest attributes of virtuosity with those of the interpretative artist.

Mr Flesch has not a prepossessing personality. In presence he scarcely could be called commanding. His manner during the long orchestral prelude denoted some nervousness, but once launched in his part, the man was forgotten and a new and absorbing personality arose out of his playing.

It would be impertinent to discuss matters of technic were Mr Flesch not a stranger. His feats are accomplished with the quiet but sovereign skill of the artist who possesses but subordinates the dexterity of the virtuoso. The double stop passages in octaves and sixths in the cadenza were impeccable in precision and intonation. The purity of the latter is an extraordinary trait in his playing. The very heart of the tonality is always touched. It may be that the peculiar brilliance of the quality of the artist's tone accounts in part for this, a brilliance of crystaline and penetrating transparency, and yet of abundant warmth and vitality, a tone which under the nuances of this bow can be as caressing as that of Mr Ysaye in his best estate, and also disclose the incisive, finely tempered intellectuality of Kreisler.

It is to be hoped not only that many of those who study the violin heard Mr Flesch either yesterday afternoon, or will hear him tonight, but those who study singing as well. The delicacy of shading, the constant ebb and flow of tone, the avoidance of barren, flat lines in dynamics, and the lyric impulse which he permits to sing broadly through a phrase, makes his playing of sustained song a thing of ravishing beauty. Nor should the clearness of his articulation be forgotten, nor his refusal, even in the boldest bravura in which he plays with true abandon and rhythmic verve, to force tone beyond the true capacity of his instrument.

Rhythmically, Mr Flesch has a birthright not given to the average European. The wild spirit of the Hungarian dance controlled into an emotional force of tremendous vitality courses through all that he does. There were his individual ideas as to tempo, but they never clouded, rather emphasized the emport of the passage, and Dr Muck was resourceful. Here is a violinist worthy to stand beside Mr Kreisler and Mr Thibaud, an artist who employs a masterful musicianship to re-create the thought of the composer. Mr Flesch was received with the demonstration of favor which he deserved.

Following the concerto, Dr Muck revived Debussy's suite, "Iberia," which Mr Fiedler played several seasons ago. The work again was of interest as the speech of an impressionism employing the colors of the orchestra in the imagination and exotic tone painting of a genius. Dr Muck's interpretation of the second movement, "the odorous night," was a remarkable one, unerring in its sense of a continuity of thoughts, adjacent, yet irrelevant, reflecting the sweet chaos of the voices and perfumes of the night.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, with its faded and obvious formulas, began the concert, the devices that sound trite to modern ears accustomed to less ingenuous things than the sentimental sixths, the pompous flourishes and the Scotch tunes. This may be said for Mendelssohn; he scored with a cunning hand and his work is clear and transparent. The symphony was played entire without pause. It was received with enthusiasm.

JOURNAL
Providenc

…ting a Catast…

…ameful overcrowd… at Infantry Hall o… the performance of th… y Orchestra shoul… permitted in this city… as choked with people s… er to shoulder, and every… exit was entirely blocked, in… on of all safety and fire laws.

In spite of the changes forced on the Infantry Hall management some years ago, when large exits were cut on the east side of the auditorium, the place remains to-day little better than a fire trap of the most pronounced character, to say nothing of the absolute lack of ventilation which makes the air unfit for any human being to breathe whenever there is a large audience. When, in addition to these defects, conditions such as those of Tuesday night are allowed to exist, some speedy arrests are in order.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
MAR 25 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE AT INFANTRY HALL

Appearing as Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert, Famous Pianist Given Flattering Reception. — Orchestra Gives Excellent Programme.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphany No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17.................... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he waited for the opening bars to be played. Evidence there was of his recent ordeal in the nervous hands that held themselves in readiness to enter upon their task. But once the first note was struck much of that dropped away.

Brilliantly he played, and, as time lets no one stand still, so Paderewski has apparently changed. What he has lost in the fervency of youth, he has probably gained in maturity of judgment. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault, for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

So, too, must admiration be expressed for Dr. Muck as he played upon his ochestra, expressing through his players, his own individuality and interpretation of the composition, upon which Mr. Paderewski embroidered, with equal brilliancy, his o… added t… brillian…

Again and again the audience r… him at the close of the perform… following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment; again and again he grasped the conductor's hand, the concert-meister's hand and bowed further acknowledgment.

Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakespeare had his inspiration when he referred to the "little more than a little" that is "by much too much." So there were those in the audience that would have preferred to remember Paderewski's playing of his own concerto, than the encore, in which it must be confessed he showed a tendency to maltreat the piano. And yet, all gratitude should be expressed for his generosity after so brilliant a display.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist.

A. W. C.

From News
Address Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25 19
k, 1884

BIG RECEPTION GIVEN PADEREWSKI AT HIS CONCERT

Paderewski's presence in this city last evening as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra drew a large audience to Infantry hall.

Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra during the program, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36........................ Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.

Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow. Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale.

For sheer beauty, the second number on the program, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrims' Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with delicacy and precision.

With the entrance of Paderewski came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordiality of his reception could have left him no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances here.

He played brilliantly. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance, following enthusiastic bursts of applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment. Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last, after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one it was again seated.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence [illegible] will be the soloist.

Cuvier's, the great [illegible] naturalist, an… two schooners

TIGHT BINDING

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 22 1

PIANISTIC TREAT FROM PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony Concert Took on the Aspect of a Brilliant Recital.

GENEROUS WITH ENCORES

Artist Who Still Remains the Master and Poet of the Keyboard.

Every one of discriminating musical [illegible] favors the "no-encore" rule so generally enforced at symphony concerts in this country. Yet those most opposed to encores realize that there are occasions at which the rigidity of the rule can be relaxed without destroying the unity of a performance. At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Academy of Music last Monday night the wildest enthusiasm and approval were exhibited when Paderewski signified his willingness to add to the brilliant performance he had given. This being the closing concert of the Boston Orchestra for this season, doubtless Dr. Muck felt inclined to indulge the patrons of the orchestra who have evinced so warm and intelligent an interest in his work this winter.

There was a general feeling when Paderewski was put down for the last number on the program that he would be permitted to use his own pleasure in responding to the applause of his admirers, so no one was greatly surprised when he played the first encore. Although there was some astonishment that he should add a second, and especially so brilliant and elaborate a thing as the Liszt Sixth Rhapsody.

Paderewski has been bitterly and unreasonably assailed in this country this season. Just why so much adverse criticism of him should have arisen is somewhat of a mystery. Even if the adverse criticism were justified, it would seem that common courtesy would prohibit some of the thrusts made at him and at his playing. If he had any severe critics in this city, and doubtless he had, they must have been pretty effectually silenced by his astonishing performance Monday night. It was the greatest concert given here this season by the Boston Orchestra, and Paderewski's work was a climax that lifted the entire occasion into one of those thrilling experiences that live in the memory and establish a standard that is rarely approximated and never surpassed.

One of the odd points about the whole event was that Paderewski should have set an audience into something closely akin to frenzy by the performance of a concerto entirely unknown. He is acknowledged, of course, as a composer of taste and skill, as well as of decided originality, but it was none of those facts that inflamed his auditors—it was the way he played. His concerto is remarkably beautiful and brilliant—a splendid orchestral piece for any one technically equipped to master its intricate passages. It was not the brilliancy of his composition, however, that caught the audience; it was the personality of the man and his superb playing. His work was flawless, his tone beautiful and of a resonance that kept it ringing continuously above the orchestra. The variety of tone was endless, while the technique was so strong that it left the audience in a state of bewilderment.

The Rubenstein Barcarolle, given as the first encore, was remarkable for a tonal quality that approached in its perfection the beauty of an ideal voice. With this went, in the technical passages, a fleetness and delicacy of concention fairy-like in crystalline purity. This Barcarolle, if not given a distinguished reading, is not a piece that is more than passably interesting. In Paderewski's interpretation of it there was a variety of expression and such a novelty of style that it became an important and compelling song, possessing unlimited possibilities of expression. There was some feeling of regret that he should have chosen for the second encore the rather banal Sixth Rhapsody of Liszt. Paderewski probably felt that the intense excitement reigning should be answered with some big, overwhelming tonal picture. His version of the rhapsody was very much embellished. He, like all the concert pianists, omitted the second movement, the short scherzo, but he so amplified the third movement that it was scarcely recognizable. The melody, played in octaves, was not at all like the original, although it was rather a novelty to hear it in such a voluminous disguise. All the big pianists like to play the last movement of this rhapsody. It is a great octave study, and, while it is not long, it is exceedingly brilliant and always makes an impression.

Those close enough to Paderewski were surprised at the nervousness he exhibited when not engaged in playing. He has always been so identified with quiet and repose that it was sad to witness the struggle he had to keep within bounds. This condition did not extend to his playing. As soon as he got under way the tension seemed to vanish and he was again the great master whose poise has always been a marvel in itself. It is a pity to see these great musicians on the ragged edge of nervous collapse, but it is one of the penalties they incur in working themselves to such a fine condition of virtuosity.

It may be possible for Paderewski to [illegible] here in recital. If he does he

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR 4 - 1914

One of the most striking scenes ever witnessed in a local hall was enacted at the final Thursday evening concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra. For nearly a quarter of an hour the audience, which crowded the hall to hear Stransky conduct a Wagner programme, remained to recall the conductor, who at last seemed quite dazed by the persistent demonstration. He had reason to be proud, for no conductor has ever more completely won the admiration of the best audiences in New York than he has in the short time he has been here. To be sure, the praise due him and his orchestra has been but grudgingly bestowed, or entirely withheld, by some persons, for reasons not unknown to those familiar with musical politics. "Down with the Philharmonic!" was the parole for years and everyone of its conductors—among them such giants as Theodore Thomas, Anton Seidl, Wassily Safonoff, and Gustav Mahler—was persistently belittled. Had Thomas, Seidl, Safonoff, and Mahler been conductors of the Boston Orchestra, they would have been lauded to the skies. It is a curious situation, quite unparalleled in any city in the world. A favorite dodge resorted to with the intention of injuring the Philharmonic is the statement: "The audience was not large." As a matter of fact, while some of the Philharmonic audiences fill the house, most of them do not. It would be a miracle if they did. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave fifty concerts here instead of only ten, it would often be unable to fill Carnegie Hall. In no city in America or Europe would the best orchestra in the world draw forty or more full houses in one season. Persons who do not understand this situation naturally infer, on reading, that "the audience was not large" that the orchestra is not good enough to draw a large audience, and thus they remain away to their own great loss. Had not Mr. Pulitzer come to the rescue with his gift of nearly a million, the orchestra would have succumbed to these attacks. Now that it cannot be killed any more, why continue the war? The only result is that certain noble women have to work harder collecting money to make up the inevitable deficit; for the interest on the Pulitzer money does not suffice to pay all the expenses of keeping up an orchestra which has no superior, and in the leaders of the different instrumental choirs, no equal in the world.

From COURANT
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date MAR 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will appear at the Parsons Theater on Tuesday evening, April 7, for the second and last time this season. It is everywhere conceded that this great orchestra has never before attained such artistic excellence and brilliant virtuosity as at present under Dr. Muck's conductorship, and its appearance here at the ~~close of so remarkable~~ a season is of unusual interest. In keeping with a tried and now well established policy of the Boston management and Dr. Muck, the orchestra will appear without soloist. This enables the conductor to present a more artistically arranged program and provides from twenty to thirty minutes more of orchestral music as performed by the finest body of instrumental virtuosi in the world. This departure from the custom of former concerts has frequently been requested by Hartford patrons of long standing, and Dr. Muck will present a program at the coming concert so brilliant and varied in character that enthusiastic praise and general approval of the plan will follow. Four composers are represented in the selections, as follows: Tchaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony," Bizet's suite, "L'Arsienne," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprices," and Liszt's "Preludes." Reserved seats will be on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store Monday and until the evening of concert.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date APR 5 1914

SYMPHONY, even when most successful, is an expensive luxury. As expensive, in proportion to the scope it has, as most grand opera schemes.

Work as they will—and they work very hard—the directors of our local symphony socieities (there are now been able to balance the cost of their admirable enterprises and their receipts.

It astonished some, no doubt, to six or seven of them) have never learn one day that the Philharmonic Society, founded three-quarters of a century ago and seemingly prosperous, was carried on at a dead annual loss of over a hundred thousand dollars.

Thanks to the posthumous kindness of a wealthy man, this deficit will, at least in part, be met. Yet, even so, there may still be a heavy loss each year.

Last week we heard, too, that the Symphony Society, the chief New York competitor of the Philharmonic, had also been conducted at a loss of fifty or sixty thousand dollars yearly.

Some less ambitious symphony organizations, as, for examples, the Volpe, Peoples, Russian and Italian societies, are also now kept up without hope of profit. Altogether, it seems plain that symphony orchestras are expressions of altruism. For many seasons (and maybe to this day) even the most famous of them, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not supported itself.

Various methods of providing a remedy for this state of things have been suggested. One has advocated economy. Another has advised lavishness. Reductions in the salaries of conductors have been tried temporarily and extravagant additions to those salaries have also been tried, without notably helping the societies. It has been realized that one could not expect to solve the difficulty by raising the cost of seats at the symphonic concerts. Nowhere will people pay as much for concerts as they will for opera.

The one and only hope of being able to maintain great symphony orchestras, then, lies in the munificence of a few wealthy music lovers.

An example to them all was set long years ago, in Boston, by Mr. Higginson. And, in New York, that excellent gentleman has at last found emulators.

The thanks of this community, as well as the deep gratitude of the organization directly interested, should go to Mr. Henry H. Flagler, who, last week, announced that beginning with May next he stood ready to defray personally any deficit of the New York Symphony Society.

The sum to which Mr. Flagler limits his annual largesse is said to be $100,000. But this, as we have seen, is far in excess of any probable deficit.

With the encouragement of Mr. Flagler's promise, Walter Damrosch, the unwearying conductor of the society, should feel quite at ease. Perhaps, who knows, some day the Symphony and the Philharmonic will rise to the splendid heights attained by the great Boston orchestra.

To do this, they will have to think of art first and of business after. Consistency of plan would seem to have been guaranteed by the reelections of Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Stransky. We may be sure that for their own fame's sake, no less than for our good, those conductors will strive harder now than ever to improve their orchestras and to put life into their programmes.

* * *

In music as in literature, the one unpardonable sin is dullness. The programmes of our symphony societies should not be narrow. It might be well if Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch would both dare more now and then. We might not murmur if, instead of their frequent Wagner schemes, they gave us more programmes of a modern kind.

Our symphonic sympathies are not bounded by Bach, Bruch, Brahms and Beethoven. The young French and German schools are worth exploring. Schoenberg and Florent Schmitt, Reger and d'Indy have hardly been touched yet. It might be interesting, too, to know more of composers like Wallace, whose beautiful "Villon" made such an impression on us a couple of seasons ago. Slavonic music has been treated more handsomely by our local directors than French and English or some forms of recent German art. And, last, not least, we should like to see more generosity toward American music in the attitude of our two leading organizations.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date APR 5 1914

To the Editor of The New York Ti

Sir: Your paper's attitude [illegible] in respect to the wonderful Ellery concerts now being given in the sch auditoriums, I consider a gross inju to your thousands of musical reade who would like to hear about the concerts. That a band capable of doing such work as this one can come and go unheralded by our press is a sad commentary on our boasted sense of justice and love for music.

After hearing the band render the overture to "William Tell" and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" an "I Pagliacci" last evening in a manner which places the Metropolitan Opera and the Boston Symphony orchestras in a second place by comparison, I came away thoroughly disgusted with the whole tribe of newspaper musical critics.

If you have any one in your employ who understands music and with red blood in his veins, then let him go and hear this band and he will find to his surprise that it is not a band at all, not in the usual sense, but an orchestra of supurb quality. Yours for fair play,

WERNER BOECKLIN.
New York, March 31, 1914.

Mr. Werner Boecklin appears to be somewhat hasty or unduly violent in his denunciations of a whole tribe. He might reflect, with Marcus Aurelius, "that reasoning beings were created for one another's sake; that to be patient is a branch of justice, and that men sin without intending it." Or the saying of Epictetus is appropriate: "Be not hurried away by excitement, but say, 'Semblance, wait for me a little. Let me see what you are and what you represent. Let me try you.'" And, trying, he would have found that THE TIMES printed a welcoming notice of the first concert of the Ellery Band the morning after it occurred, cordially recognizing certain merits in its playing and announcing the continuation of its performances. This notice was longer than some that have been given on occasion to the Metropolitan Opera and the Boston Symphony Orchestras, which are so suddenly and, as it seems, dogmatically, and without reasonable explanation, relegated to "second place." THE TIMES reserves the privilege, however, of still esteeming these orchestras as of the highest quality, not of the second; nor will it enter into a discussion of the relative artistic standing of a brass band, however "supurb" in quality, playing music that was conceived, intended, and originally written for an orchestra, and transcribed, usually by some unauthorized person, for the wholly different sonorities of brass instruments. The brass band has its place, and an estimable one; and the band in question has high merits, but they are its own merits, and not those of another artistic apparatus. Mr. Werner Boecklin writes as one darkening counsel when he says that its merits make the Ellery Band "not a band at all but an orchestra." And he has ventured upon ground where he has no standing in issuing a wholesale denunciation of musical critics, many of whom have red blood in their veins, and who have devoted their lives to the study of an art in which he seems to have some dilettante interest and to be afflicted with the little knowledge which is a dangerous thing.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

From JOURNA
Address: Pro

PADE FO

Is Soloist
Concer

GIVEN FL

Crowd Th
Auditoriu
Program
Celebrate
Arouse E

Announceme be the assis cert in the sufficient to audience to and not in concerts ha enthusiastic seats filled, to the balco
cony aisles, and a row the wall to throughout hearing a come to b greatest pian
But before was a perfo
in itself was
As was to ance of so was present orchestra th
programme,
following or

Symphony No.
1. Andante anima
2. Andantin
3. Scherzo;
4. Finale:
Overture, "Ta Concerto in A chestra, Op.
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza
3. Allegro

The fourth been Tschai melody, rhy it to many volatile Fre cepted it kin not wear, b
the cheerfu which respo which have regarded a written as it tense menta produced in in 1890, 12 ye ance in Mosc
Last evenin dividuality fr
the first mov beauty of th allow so muc of instrumen and richness brought out.
variety even monplace, bu ment was the majority of to find especi melody of the tain it is tha conductor at recalling him disappeared f
For sheer b
the programm
"Tannhauser, calm lovelines
the wild fr music as a the themes were played cision rising that were recognized.
With the
the long-loo
diality of hi
Paderewski
the affection him in all h came to the ago.
That the y together li waited for t Evidence th in the nerv selves in r task. But much of th Brilliantly no one sta parently c the fervent gained in times last inspiration while at t touched up harshly cr season and
It is evi has lost technique certo, wh time in thi
King at a and playe first visite modern a
As has the great velopmen and one who, on for the f miration upon th

TIGHT BINDING

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 22 1

PIANISTIC TREAT FROM PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony Concert Took on the Aspect of a Brilliant Recital.

GENEROUS WITH ENCORES

Artist Who Still Remains the Master and Poet of the Keyboard.

Every one of discriminating musical taste favors the "no-encore" rule so generally enforced at symphony concerts in this country. Yet those most opposed to encores realize that there are occasions at which the rigidity of the rule can be relaxed without destroying the unity of a performance. At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Academy of Music last Monday night the wildest enthusiasm and approval were exhibited when Paderewski signified his willingness to add to the brilliant performance he had given. This being the closing concert of the Boston Orchestra for this season, doubtless Dr. Muck felt inclined to indulge the patrons of the orchestra who have evinced so warm and intelligent an interest in his work this winter.

There was a general feeling when Paderewski was put down for the last number on the program that he would be permitted to use his own pleasure in responding to the applause of his admirers, so no one was greatly surprised when he played the first encore. Although there was some astonishment that he should add a second, and especially so brilliant and elaborate a thing as the Liszt Sixth Rhapsody.

Paderewski has been bitterly and unreasonably assailed in this country this season. Just why so much adverse criticism of him should have arisen is somewhat of a mystery. Even if the adverse criticism were justified, it would seem that common courtesy would prohibit some of the thrusts made at him and at his playing. If he had any severe critics in this city, and doubtless he had, they must have been pretty effectually silenced by his astonishing performance Monday night. It was the greatest concert given here this season by the Boston Orchestra, and Paderewski's work was a climax that lifted the entire occasion into one of those thrilling experiences that live in the memory and establish a standard that is rarely approximated and never surpassed.

One of the odd points about the whole event was that Paderewski should have set an audience into something closely akin to frenzy by the performance of a concerto entirely unknown. He is acknowledged, of course, as a composer of taste and skill, as well as of decided originality, but it was none of those facts that inflamed his auditors—it was the way he played. His concerto is remarkably beautiful and brilliant—a splendid orchestral piece for any one technically equipped to master its intricate passages. It was not the brilliancy of his composition, however, that caught the audience; it was the personality of the man and his superb playing. His work was flawless, his tone beautiful and of a resonance that kept it ringing continuously above the orchestra. The variety of tone was endless, while the technique was so strong that it left the audience in a state of bewilderment.

The Rubenstein Barcarolle, given as the first encore, was remarkable for a tonal quality that approached in its perfection the beauty of an ideal voice. With this went, in the technical passages, a fleetness and delicacy of conception fairy-like in crystalline purity. This Barcarolle, if not given a distinguished reading, is not a piece that is more than passably interesting. In Paderewski's interpretation of it there was a variety of expression and such a novelty of style that it became an important and compelling song, possessing unlimited possibilities of expression. There was some feeling of regret that he should have chosen for the second encore the rather banal Sixth Rhapsody of Liszt. Paderewski probably felt that the intense excitement reigning should be answered with some big, overwhelming tonal picture. His version of the rhapsody was very much embellished. He, like all the concert pianists, omitted the second movement, the short scherzo, but he so amplified the third movement that it was scarcely recognizable. The melody, played in octaves, was not at all like the original, although it was rather a novelty to hear it in such a voluminous disguise. All the big pianists like to play the last movement of this rhapsody. It is a great octave study, and, while it is not long, it is exceedingly brilliant and always makes an impression.

Those close enough to Paderewski were surprised at the nervousness he exhibited when not engaged in playing. He has always been so identified with quiet and repose that it was sad to witness the struggle he had to keep within bounds. This condition did not extend to his playing. As soon as he got under way the tension seemed to vanish and he was again the great master whose poise has always been a marvel in itself. It is a pity to see these great musicians on the ragged edge of nervous collapse, but it is one of the penalties they incur in working themselves to such a fine condition of virtuosity.

It may be possible for Paderewski to appear here in recital. If he does he

---

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City
Date APR 4 - 1914

One of the most striking scenes ever witnessed in a local hall was enacted at the final Thursday evening concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra. For nearly a quarter of an hour the audience, which crowded the hall to hear Stransky conduct a Wagner programme, remained to recall the conductor, who at last seemed quite dazed by the persistent demonstration. He had reason to be proud, for no conductor has ever more completely won the admiration of the best audiences in New York than he has in the short time he has been here. To be sure, the praise due him and his orchestra has been but grudgingly bestowed, or entirely withheld, by some persons, for reasons not unknown to those familiar with musical politics. "Down with the Philharmonic!" was the parole for years and everyone of its conductors—among them such giants as Theodore Thomas, Anton Seidl, Wassily Safonoff, and Gustav Mahler—was persistently belittled. Had Thomas, Seidl, Safonoff, and Mahler been conductors of the Boston Orchestra, they would have been lauded to the skies. It is a curious situation, quite unparalleled in any city in the world. A favorite dodge resorted to with the intention of injuring the Philharmonic is the statement: "The audience was not large." As a matter of fact, while some of the Philharmonic audiences fill the house, most of them do not. It would be a miracle if they did. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave fifty concerts here instead of only ten, it would often be unable to fill Carnegie Hall. In no city in America or Europe would the best orchestra in the world draw forty or more full houses in one season. Persons who do not understand this situation naturally infer, on reading, that "the audience was not large" that the orchestra is not good enough to draw a large audience, and thus they remain away to their own great loss. Had not Mr. Pulitzer come to the rescue with his gift of nearly a million, the orchestra would have succumbed to these attacks. Now that it cannot be killed any more, why continue the war? The only result is that certain noble women have to work harder collecting money to make up the inevitable deficit; for the interest on the Pulitzer money does not suffice to pay all the expenses of keeping up an orchestra which has no superior, and in the leaders of the different instrumental choirs, no equal in the world.

From COURANT
Address HARTFORD. CONN.
Date MAR 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will appear at the Parsons Theater on Tuesday evening, April 7, for the second and last time this season. It is everywhere conceeded that this great orchestra has never before attained such artistic excellence and brilliant virtuosity as at present under Dr. Muck's conductorship, and its appearance here at the close of so remarkable a season is of unusual interest. In keeping with a tried and now well established policy of the Boston management and Dr. Muck, the orchestra will appear without soloist. This enables the conductor to present a more artistically arranged program and provides from twenty to thirty minutes more of orchestral music as performed by the finest body of instrumental virtuosi in the world. This departure from the custom of former concerts has frequently been requested by Hartford patrons of long standing, and Dr. Muck will present a program at the coming concert so brilliant and varied in character that enthusiastic praise and general approval of the plan will follow. Four composers are represented in the selections, as follows: Tchaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony," Bizet's suite, "L'Arsienne," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprices," and Liszt's "Preludes." Reserved seats will be on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store Monday and until the evening of concert.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date APR 5 1914

SYMPHONY, even when most successful, is an expensive luxury. As expensive, in proportion to the scope it has, as most grand opera schemes.

Work as they will—and they work very hard—the directors of our local symphony societties (there are now been able to balance the cost of their admirable enterprises and their receipts.

It astonished some, no doubt, to six or seven of them) have never learn one day that the Philharmonic Society, founded three-quarters of a century ago and seemingly prosperous, was carried on at a dead annual loss of over a hundred thousand dollars.

Thanks to the posthumous kindness of a wealthy man, this deficit will, at least in part, be met. Yet, even so, there may still be a heavy loss each year.

Last week we heard, too, that the Symphony Society, the chief New York competitor of the Philharmonic, had also been conducted at a loss of fifty or sixty thousand dollars yearly.

Some less ambitious symphony organizations, as, for examples, the Volpe, People's, Russian and Italian societies, are also now kept up without hope of profit. Altogether, it seems plain that symphony orchestras are expressions of altruism. For many seasons (and maybe to this day) even the most famous of them, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not supported itself.

Various methods of providing a remedy for this state of things have been suggested. One has advocated economy. Another has advised lavishness. Reductions in the salaries of conductors have been tried temporarily and extravagant additions to those salaries have also been tried, without notably helping the societies. It has been realized that one could not expect to solve the difficulty by raising the cost of seats at the symphonic concerts. Nowhere will people pay as much for concerts as they will for opera.

The one and only hope of being able to maintain great symphony orchestras, then, lies in the munificence of a few wealthy music lovers.

An example to them all was set long years ago, in Boston, by Mr. Higginson. And, in New York, that excellent gentleman has at last found emulators.

The thanks of this community, as well as the deep gratitude of the organization directly interested, should go to Mr. Henry H. Flagler, who, last week, announced that beginning with May next he stood ready to defray personally any deficit of the New York Symphony Society.

The sum to which Mr. Flagler limits his annual largesse is said to be $100,000. But this, as we have seen, is far in excess of any probable deficit.

With the encouragement of Mr. Flagler's promise, Walter Damrosch, the unwearying conductor of the society, should feel quite at ease. Perhaps, who knows, some day the Symphony and the Philharmonic will rise to the splendid heights attained by the great Boston orchestra.

To do this, they will have to think of art first and of business after. Consistency of plan would seem to have been guaranteed by the reelections of Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Stransky. We may be sure that for their own fame's sake, no less than for our good, those conductors will strive harder now than ever to improve their orchestras and to put life into their programmes.

* * *

In music as in literature, the one unpardonable sin is dullness. The programmes of our symphony societies should not be narrow. It might be well if Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch would both dare more now and then. We might not murmur if, instead of their frequent Wagner schemes, they gave us more programmes of a modern kind.

Our symphonic sympathies are not bounded by Bach, Bruch, Brahms and Beethoven. The young French and German schools are worth exploring. Schoenberg and Florent Schmitt, Reger and d'Indy have hardly been touched yet. It might be interesting, too, to know more of composers like Wallace, whose beautiful "Villon" made such an impression on us a couple of seasons ago. Slavonic music has been treated more handsomely by our local directors than French and English or some forms of recent German art. And, last, not least, we should like to see more generosity toward American music in the attitude of our two leading organizations.

TIMES
ess: New York City
APR 5 1914

To the Editor of The New York Tim

Sir: Your paper's attitude of silen in respect to the wonderful Ellery co certs now being given in the scho auditoriums, I consider a gross inju to your thousands of musical reade who would like to hear about the concerts. That a band capable of doing such work as this one can come and go unheralded by our press is a sad commentary on our boasted sense of justice and love for music.

After hearing the band render the overture to "William Tell" and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" an "I Pagliacci" last evening in a manner which places the Metropolita Opera and the Boston Symphony orchestras in a second place by comparison, I came away thoroughly disgusted with the whole tribe of newspaper musical critics.

If you have any one in your employ who understands music and with red blood in his veins, then let him go and hear this band and he will find to his surprise that it is not a band at all, not in the usual sense, but an orchestra of supurb quality. Yours for fair play,

WERNER BOECKLIN.

New York, March 31, 1914.

Mr. Werner Boecklin appears to be somewhat hasty or unduly violent in his denunciations of a whole tribe. He might reflect, with Marcus Aurelius, "that reasoning beings were created for one another's sake; that to be patient is a branch of justice, and that men sin without intending it." Or the saying of Epictetus is appropriate: "Be not hurried away by excitement, but say, 'Semblance, wait for me a little. Let me see what you are and what you represent. Let me try you.'" And, trying, he would have found that THE TIMES printed a welcoming notice of the first concert of the Ellery Band the morning after it occurred, cordially recognizing certain merits in its playing and announcing the continuation of its performances. This notice was longer than some that have been given on occasion to the Metropolitan Opera and the Boston Symphony Orchestras, which are so suddenly and, as it seems, dogmatically, and without reasonable explanation, relegated to "second place." THE TIMES reserves the privilege, however, of still esteeming these orchestras as of the highest quality, not of the second; nor will it enter into a discussion of the relative artistic standing of a brass band, however "supurb" in quality, playing music that was conceived, intended, and originally written for an orchestra, and transcribed, usually by some unauthorized person, for the wholly different sonorities of brass instruments. The brass band has its place, and an estimable one; and the band in question has high merits, but they are its own merits, and not those of another artistic apparatus. Mr. Werner Boecklin writes as one darkening counsel when he says that its merits make the Ellery Band "not a band at all but an orchestra." And he has ventured upon ground where he has no standing in issuing a wholesale denunciation of musical critics, many of whom have red blood in their veins, and who have devoted their lives to the study of an art in which he seems to have some dilettante interest and to be afflicted with the little knowledge which is a dangerous thing.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

TIGHT BINDING

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date MAR 22 1914

PIANISTIC TREAT FROM PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony Concert Took on the Aspect of a Brilliant Recital.

GENEROUS WITH ENCORES

Artist Who Still Remains the Master and Poet of the Keyboard.

Every one of discriminating musical taste favors the "no-encore" rule so generally enforced at symphony concerts in this country. Yet those most opposed to encores realize that there are occasions at which the rigidity of the rule can be relaxed without destroying the unity of a performance. At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the Academy of Music last Monday night the wildest enthusiasm and approval were exhibited when Paderewski signified his willingness to add to the brilliant performance he had given. This being the closing concert of the Boston Orchestra for this season, doubtless Dr. Muck felt inclined to indulge the patrons of the orchestra who have evinced so warm and intelligent an interest in his work this winter.

There was a general feeling when Paderewski was put down for the last number on the program that he would be permitted to use his own pleasure in responding to the applause of his admirers, so no one was greatly surprised when he played the first encore. Although there was some astonishment that he should add a second, and especially so brilliant and elaborate a thing as the Liszt Sixth Rhapsody.

Paderewski has been bitterly and unreasonably assailed in this country this season. Just why so much adverse criticism of him should have arisen is somewhat of a mystery. Even if the adverse criticism were justified, it would seem that common courtesy would prohibit some of the thrusts made at him and at his playing. If he had any severe critics in this city, and doubtless he had, they must have been pretty effectually silenced by his astonishing performance Monday night. It was the greatest concert given here this season by the Boston Orchestra, and Paderewski's work was a climax that lifted the entire occasion into one of those thrilling experiences that live in the memory and establish a standard that is rarely approximated and never surpassed.

One of the odd points about the whole event was that Paderewski should have set an audience into something closely akin to frenzy by the performance of a concerto entirely unknown. He is acknowledged, of course, as a composer of taste and skill, as well as of decided originality, but it was none of those facts that inflamed his auditors—it was the way he played. His concerto is remarkably beautiful and brilliant—a splendid orchestral piece for any one technically equipped to master its intricate passages. It was not the brilliancy of his composition, however, that caught the audience; it was the personality of the man and his superb playing. His work was flawless, his tone beautiful and of a resonance that kept it ringing continuously above the orchestra. The variety of tone was endless, while the technique was so strong that it left the audience in a state of bewilderment.

The Rubenstein Barcarolle, given as the first encore, was remarkable for a tonal quality that approached in its perfection the beauty of an ideal voice. With this went, in the technical passages, a fleetness and delicacy of conception fairy-like in crystalline purity. This Barcarolle, if not given a distinguished reading, is not a piece that is more than passably interesting. In Paderewski's interpretation of it there was a variety of expression and such a novelty of style that it became an important and compelling song, possessing unlimited possibilities of expression. There was some feeling of regret that he should have chosen for the second encore the rather banal Sixth Rhapsody of Liszt. Paderewski probably felt that the intense excitement reigning should be answered with some big, overwhelming tonal picture. His version of the rhapsody was very much embellished. He, like all the concert pianists, omitted the second movement, the short scherzo, but he so amplified the third movement that it was scarcely recognizable. The melody, played in octaves, was not at all like the original, although it was rather a novelty to hear it in such a voluminous disguise. All the big pianists like to play the last movement of this rhapsody. It is a great octave study, and, while it is not long, it is exceedingly brilliant and always makes an impression.

Those close enough to Paderewski were surprised at the nervousness he exhibited when not engaged in playing. He has always been so identified with quiet and repose that it was sad to witness the struggle he had to keep within bounds. This condition did not extend to his playing. As soon as he got under way the tension seemed to vanish and he was again the great master whose poise has always been a marvel in itself. It is a pity to see these great musicians on the ragged edge of nervous collapse, but it is one of the penalties they incur in working themselves to such a fine condition of virtuosity.

It may be possible for Paderewski to appear here in recital. If he does he

---

EVENING POST
ress: New York City
APR 4 - 1914

e of the most striking scenes ever essed in a local hall was enacted at final Thursday evening concert of Philharmonic Orchestra. For nearly arter of an hour the audience, which ded the hall to hear Stransky con-a Wagner programme, remained to the conductor, who at last seemed dazed by the persistent demonstration. He had reason to be proud, for no conductor has ever more completely won the admiration of the best audiences in New York than he has in the short time he has been here. To be sure, the praise due him and his orchestra has been but grudgingly bestowed, or entirely withheld, by some persons, for reasons not unknown to those familiar with musical politics. "Down with the Philharmonic!" was the parole for years and everyone of its conductors—among them such giants as Theodore Thomas, Anton Seidl, Wassily Safonoff, and Gustav Mahler—was persistently belittled. Had Thomas, Seidl, Safonoff, and Mahler been conductors of the Boston Orchestra, they would have been lauded to the skies. It is a curious situation, quite unparalleled in any city in the world. A favorite dodge resorted to with the intention of injuring the Philharmonic is the statement: "The audience was not large." As a matter of fact, while some of the Philharmonic audiences fill the house, most of them do not. It would be a miracle if they did. If the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave fifty concerts here instead of only ten, it would often be unable to fill Carnegie Hall. In no city in America or Europe would the best orchestra in the world draw forty or more full houses in one season. Persons who do not understand this situation naturally infer, on reading, that "the audience was not large" that the orchestra is not good enough to draw a large audience, and thus they remain away to their own great loss. Had not Mr. Pulitzer come to the rescue with his gift of nearly a million, the orchestra would have succumbed to these attacks. Now that it cannot be killed any more, why continue the war? The only result is that certain noble women have to work harder collecting money to make up the inevitable deficit; for the interest on the Pulitzer money does not suffice to pay all the expenses of keeping up an orchestra which has no superior, and in the leaders of the different instrumental choirs, no equal in the world.

From COURANT
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date MAR 21 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will appear at the Parsons Theater on Tuesday evening, April 7, for the second and last time this season. It is everywhere conceeded that this great orchestra has never before attained such artistic excellence and brilliant virtuosity as at present under Dr. Muck's conductorship, and its appearance here at the close of so remarkable a season is of unusual interest. In keeping with a tried and now well established policy of the Boston management and Dr. Muck, the orchestra will appear without soloist. This enables the conductor to present a more artistically arranged program and provides from twenty to thirty minutes more of orchestral music as performed by the finest body of instrumental virtuosi in the world. This departure from the custom of former concerts has frequently been requested by Hartford patrons of long standing, and Dr. Muck will present a program at the coming concert so brilliant and varied in character that enthusiastic praise and general approval of the plan will follow. Four composers are represented in the selections, as follows: Tchaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony." Bizet's suite, "L'Arsienne." Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprices," and Liszt's "Preludes." Reserved seats will be on sale at Gallup & Alfred's music store Monday and until the evening of concert.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date AP

SYMPHONY, even when m
cessful, is an expensive
As expensive, in propor the scope it has, as most opera schemes.

Work as they will—and they very hard—the directors of our symphony socletties (there are been able to balance the cost of admirable enterprises and their receipts.

It astonished some, no doubt, to six or seven of them) have never learn one day that the Philharmonic Society, founded three-quarters of a century ago and seemingly prosperous, was carried on at a dead annual loss of over a hundred thousand dollars.

Thanks to the posthumous kindness of a wealthy man, this deficit will, at least in part, be met. Yet, even so, there may still be a heavy loss each year.

Last week we heard, too, that the Symphony Society, the chief New York competitor of the Philharmonic, had also been conducted at a loss of fifty or sixty thousand dollars yearly.

Some less ambitious symphony organizations, as, for examples, the Volpe, People's, Russian and Italian societies, are also now kept up without hope of profit. Altogether, it seems plain that symphony orchestras are expressions of altruism. For many seasons (and maybe to this day) even the most famous of them, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has not supported itself.

Various methods of providing a remedy for this state of things have been suggested. One has advocated economy. Another has advised lavishness. Reductions in the salaries of conductors have been tried temporarily and extravagant additions to those salaries have also been tried, without notably helping the societies. It has been realized that one could not expect to solve the difficulty by raising the cost of seats at the symphonic concerts. Nowhere will people pay as much for concerts as they will for opera.

The one and only hope of being able to maintain great symphony orchestras, then, lies in the munificence of a few wealthy music lovers.

An example to them all was set long years ago, in Boston, by Mr. Higginson. And, in New York, that excellent gentleman has at last found emulators.

The thanks of this community, as well as the deep gratitude of the organization directly interested, should go to Mr. Henry H. Flagler, who, last week, announced that beginning with May next he stood ready to defray personally any deficit of the New York Symphony Society.

The sum to which Mr. Flagler limits his annual largesse is said to be $100,000. But this, as we have seen, is far in excess of any probable deficit.

With the encouragement of Mr. Flagler's promise, Walter Damrosch, the unwearying conductor of the society, should feel quite at ease. Perhaps, who knows, some day the Symphony and the Philharmonic will rise to the splendid heights attained by the great Boston orchestra.

To do this, they will have to think of art first and of business after. Consistency of plan would seem to have been guaranteed by the reelections of Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Stransky. We may be sure that for their own fame's sake, no less than for our good, those conductors will strive harder now than ever to improve their orchestras and to put life into their programmes.

* * *

In music as in literature, the one unpardonable sin is dullness. The programmes of our symphony societies should not be narrow. It might be well if Mr. Stransky and Mr. Damrosch would both dare more now and then. We might not murmur if, instead of their frequent Wagner schemes, they gave us more programmes of a modern kind.

Our symphonic sympathies are not bounded by Bach, Bruch, Brahms and Beethoven. The young French and German schools are worth exploring. Schoenberg and Florent Schmitt, Reger and d'Indy have hardly been touched yet. It might be interesting, too, to know more of composers like Wallace, whose beautiful "Villon" made such an impression on us a couple of seasons ago. Slavonic music has been treated more handsomely by our local directors than French and English or some forms of recent German art. And, last, not least, we should like to see more generosity toward American music in the attitude of our two leading organizations.

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date APR 5 1914

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Sir: Your paper's attitude of silen in respect to the wonderful Ellery co certs now being given in the scho auditoriums, I consider a gross insu to your thousands of musical reade who would like to hear about the concerts. That a band capable of doing such work as this one can come and go unheralded by our press is a sad commentary on our boasted sense of justice and love for music.

After hearing the band render the overture to "William Tell" and Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" and "I Pagliacci" last evening in a manner which places the Metropolitan Opera and the Boston Symphony orchestras in a second place by comparison, I came away thoroughly disgusted with the whole tribe of newspaper musical critics.

If you have any one in your employ who understands music and with red blood in his veins, then let him go and hear this band and he will find to his surprise that it is not a band at all, not in the usual sense, but an orchestra of supurb quality. Yours for fair play,

WERNER BOECKLIN.

New York, March 31, 1914.

Mr. Werner Boecklin appears to be somewhat hasty or unduly violent in his denunciations of a whole tribe. He might reflect, with Marcus Aurelius, "that reasoning beings were created for one another's sake; that to be patient is a branch of justice, and that men sin without intending it." Or the saying of Epictetus is appropriate: "Be not hurried away by excitement, but say, 'Semblance, wait for me a little. Let me see what you are and what you represent. Let me try you.'" And, trying, he would have found that THE TIMES printed a welcoming notice of the first concert of the Ellery Band the morning after it occurred, cordially recognizing certain merits in its playing and announcing the continuation of its performances. This notice was longer than some that have been given on occasion to the Metropolitan Opera and the Boston Symphony Orchestras, which are so suddenly and, as it seems, dogmatically, and without reasonable explanation, relegated to "second place." THE TIMES reserves the privilege, however, of still esteeming these orchestras as of the highest quality, not of the second; nor will it enter into a discussion of the relative artistic standing of a brass band, however "supurb" in quality, playing music that was conceived, intended, and originally written for an orchestra, and transcribed, usually by some unauthorized person, for the wholly different sonorities of brass instruments. The brass band has its place, and an estimable one; and the band in question has high merits, but they are its own merits, and not those of another artistic apparatus. Mr. Werner Boecklin writes as one darkening counsel when he says that its merits make the Ellery Band "not a band at all but an orchestra." And he has ventured upon ground where he has no standing in issuing a wholesale denunciation of musical critics, many of whom have red blood in their veins, and who have devoted their lives to the study of an art in which he seems to have some dilettante interest and to be afflicted with the little knowledge which is a dangerous thing.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence

PADEREWSKI
FOR BIG A

Is Soloist at Bosto
Concert at Infa

GIVEN FLATTERIN

Crowd That Taxe Auditorium Liste Programme by Celebrated Pianist
Arouse Enthusias

Announcement that P be the assisting soloist cert in the Boston Sym sufficient to attract audience to Infantry and not in the mem concerts has there bee enthusiastic gathering seats filled, as well as to the balcony and th cony aisles, standing r and a row of enthus
the wall down-stairs
throughout the conce hearing again the come to be heralde greatest pianist.

But before that opp was a performance b in itself was worthy
As was to be expecte ance of so illustrious was present in perso orchestra through the programme, which wa
following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor,
1. Andante sostenuto;
anima in movimento
2. Andantino in modo
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato
4. Finale: Allegro con f
Overture, "Tannhauser" Concerto in A-minor for chestra, Op. 17........
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth sympho been Tschaikowsky's melody, rhythm and it to many nations.
volatile French peopl cepted it kindly and c not wear, but it still the cheerful Americ which responds to the
which have caused th regarded as a psy written as it was du tense mental depress produced in this cou in 1890, 12 years after ance in Moscow.

Last evening it wa
dividuality from the b
the first movement to beauty of the finale.
allow so much play to of instruments in tur and richness of tone brought out. The sy variety even to bein monplace, but probab
ment was the greates majority of those pr to find especial enjoy melody of the "pizzic tain it is that ample a conductor at the end recalling him to his disappeared from view

For sheer beauty the the programme, the "Tannhauser," was u
calm loveliness of the "
the wild frenzy of music as a backgrou
the themes were wove were played with a cision rising to a
that were fully app
recognized.

With the entrance o
the long-looked-for mo
dialty of his receptio
Paderewski no doubt the affection of those him in all his appear came to the city nea ago.

That the years have together lightly was waited for the openin Evidence there was in the nervous han selves in readiness task. But once the much of that droppe

Brilliantly he playe no one stand still, so parently changed.
the fervency of you gained in maturity times last evening inspiration and with while at times, it touched upon the fa harshly criticized in season and played

It is evident tha has lost nothing technique that won certo, which was time in this country
King at a Sympho and played by th first visited that cit modern and beauti

As has been poin
the greater part of velopment is confi and one was remi who, on hearing a for the first time, miration for the
upon the invisibl stick."

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 25 1914

k, 1884

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE

Is Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert at Infantry Hall.

GIVEN FLATTERING RECEPTION

Crowd That Taxes Capacity of Auditorium Listens to Excellent Programme by Orchestra and Celebrated Pianist, Whose Efforts Arouse Enthusiasm.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17 .... Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he waited for the opening bars to be played. Evidence there was of his recent ordeal in the nervous hands that held themselves in readiness to enter upon their task. But once the first note was struck much of that dropped away.

Brilliantly he played, and, as time lets no one stand still, so Paderewski has apparently changed. What he has lost in the fervency of youth, he has probably gained in maturity of judgment. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault, for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

too, must admiration be expressed Dr. Muck as he played upon his estra, expressing through his play- his own individuality and interpreta- of the composition, upon which Mr. erewski embroidered, with equal iancy, his own dazzling qualities, and d to its vitality with a display of iancy and power.

ain and again the audience recalled at the close of the performance, wing enthusiastic bursts af applause each movement; again and again owed his acknowledgment; again and he grasped the conductor's hand, concert-meister's hand and bowed er acknowledgment.

ally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakes had his inspiration when he referr the "little more than a little" that i much too much." So there were th the audience that would have pre to remember Paderewski's playi his own concerto, than the enco which it must be confessed he show tendency to maltreat the piano. yet, all gratitude should be expresse his generosity after so brilliant a play.

The sixth and last concert of the son will be given on Tuesday eve April 14, when Miss Florence H will be the soloist. A. W.

Cuvier, the great naturalist.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
te MAR 25 1914

k, 1884

SALLIE WISTAR SAYS:

LAST autumn considerable grumbling was heard among musical people with regard to the embarrassment of harmonious riches, when both the opera company and the Boston Symphony Concert opened their respective season on the same night and, of course, at the same hour. It was regarded by some critics as an extraordinary slip on the part of one of the managements, and by others as a breach of fraternal etiquette on the part of authorities high up in musical affairs, especially as Farrar was the soloist for the Boston Symphony concert on that occasion, while Mary Garden sang her most important role, La Tosca, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At all events, it was deemed an imposition of hardship on the Philadelphia amateur who makes it a point to take in all that comes to the city that is worth while. As a fact, however, the Boston Symphony concert, which, in the opinion of most connoisseurs, is the choicest privilege of the musical season, drew a crowded house. From pit to dome the old Academy of Music was filled to its capacity, as is always the case when Doctor Karl Muck brings his 100 musicians to display to our admiration the remarkable product of many years of steady drilling, in illustration to the axiom: "Practice makes perfect."

How far the Metropolitan Opera House, with Garden as La Tosca, suffered from the competition is difficult exactly to compute under the existing habit now so prevalent in many places of "papering" the house—a process which is carried through without shears or paste—but it is none the less effective when it comes to disguising bare spots in an auditorium. However this may be, and whether the Metropolitan audience was truly profitable or not on that night, it made a brilliant showing. This nevertheless did not soothe the feelings of those who, being season subscribers to both the opera and the Boston Symphony concerts, had to relinquish one or the other of these rich, juicy, not to mention costly, treats.

ONE might think that, having done this once, the two managements would avoid in future such a conflict, which at best seems hardly courteous to one another and must be decidedly unfair to some of their most enthusiastic patrons. But the announcements of the five Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1914-15, opening on Monday, November 2, with Amato and Harold Bauer as soloists, show the selfsame disregard of common sense or of ordinary consideration for the subscribing public. For on November 2, likewise, the opera season is scheduled to open at the Metropolitan Opera House.

One might suppose that with 365 days to choose from the conflict might be avoided.

THIS reminds me of the two seven-masted schooners which some ten years ago or more were built almost simultaneously, one at Bath and the other at Camden, Me. They were noble looking ships as they glided in full sail on the water. The launching of both was attended with much ceremony and some solemnity.

There arose considerable rivalry between the shipyards, the owners and the captains. But the sea is spacious and open to all, and its broad expanses might be supposed to afford room and safety for two schooners, even though they be [illegible] crafts plied their trade along the coast for a year or two and then something happened.

One summer I missed the great ship that was such an adornment to the view, and upon inquiry the information was forthcoming.

The two schooners one day had met along the coast, and whether—as 'twas said—through pugnacity on the part of their pigheaded captains, neither of whom would give way, or merely through a coincidence of misfortune and the difficulty of maneuvering so great a sailing craft, they collided and came to woeful grief.

With the entire Atlantic at their disposal, and only two of their class on the water, were this incident used in a novel in would seem a little far-fetched, would it not?

Morale—There's room enough for all—why collide? SALLIE WISTAR.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25 1914
Establishe

BRILLIANT WORK BY PADEREWSKI

Memorable Concert by Great Pianist and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of the most brilliant concerts of many seasons in Infantry Hall, before an audience which far exceeded the seating capacity of the hall. The reason for the exceptionally large audience, as well as for the tense interest throughout the programme, was obviously to be found in the soloist of the occasio, Paderewiski. The programme was well calculated to please those who came for the exhibition of a singular puissant and widely-acclaimed personality, rather than for serious listening to a fine concert.

The programme was as follows:
Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op 36.
(I.) Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
(II.) Andantino in modo do canzona.
(III.) Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
(IV.) Finale; Allegro con fuoco.
Wagner ....Overture, "Tannhauser"
Paderewski, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op 17.
(I.) Allegro.
(II.) Romanza Andante.
(III.) Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony does not contain the noblest and best that Tschaikowsky wrote, but it does contain much that is distinctly fine. The several subjects are treated interestingly and with some degree of originality and in the frenzied finale rise to heights of power. The scherzo, played pizzicato by the strings, was exquisite, and superbly done, to the immense delight of the audience. The wood-winds, however, on whom much depended, proved disappointing both here and in the concerto. The color and tone seemed to indicate carelessness.

The overture to "Tannhauser" was put in the middle of the programme, doubtless to dilute the good music for those who are unaccustomed to so much, but in spite of that it was the finest piece of music of the evening. Coming as it did from the middle period of Wagner's work, it does not show Wagner's powers at their highest point, but it is a piece of writing constantly popular and containing much of value. It was played excellently, with due regard for the contrasting passages of the pilgrims and the Venus mountain.

It is at the present time the tendency to brush aside as of slight worth the musical compositions of a virtuoso. It has been done notably in the case of three modern pianists—Busoni, D'Albert and Paderewiski. Much of Mr. Paderewiski's music is not to be treated so lightly, however, and the concerto is an example in point. In it he affords the soloist to be sure ample chances of showing what he can do with his fingers, wrist and forearm, but as has been shown, he gives the pianoforte only what it can best do, reserving for the orchestra most of the development. The true musician is always evident, and it demands to be listened to with the closest attention.

As a pianist, Mr. Paderewiski still remains in a class by himself. Others among the vast number of concert pianists possess the technical equipment; some few surpass him in that particular possibly, but he alone seems able to force out of whatever he plays all of beauty that is in it. He is perpetually piquant, exhilarating and fully deserving of all his popularity. He is unequalled in the powerful eloquence and broad sweep of his playing.

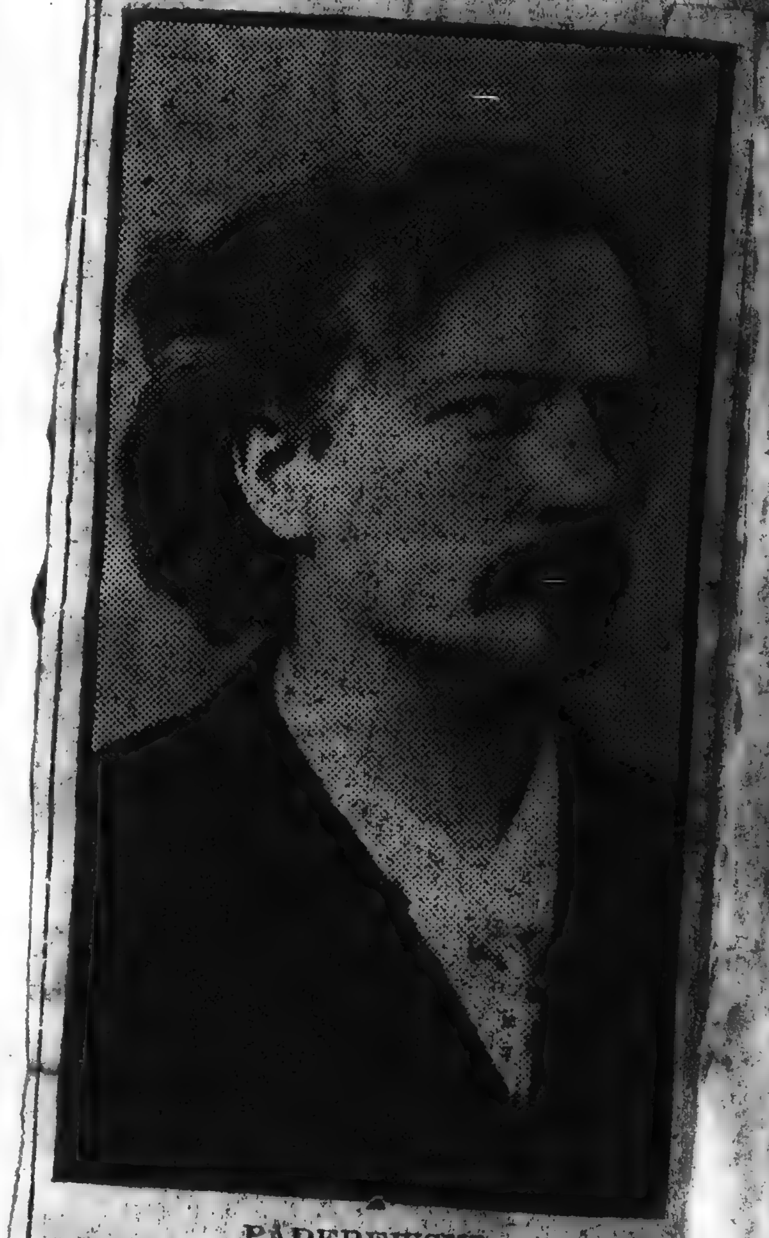
According to his usual custom—a custom allowed only to Mr. Paderewski with the Boston Symphony—in response to insistent demand he played an encore. His selection, the "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," of Wagner, was rather unfortunate. In the sensuous constantly changing coloring, he could not hope in any transcription to equal the wonder of the original, a wonder of its kind never surpassed. And immediately after the orchestral concert, the effort was the more apparent. However, he played it superbly, magnificently. Never did he employ his power of making the piano sing, as he did then, but at the greatest climax there were moments when he "pounded" simply. Perhaps alone of all pianists can it be said that he rises above the possibilities of his instrument and at such a moment, the attempt to extract impossible power from the pianoforte, results in noise. At other times he rose to the full splendor of the composition and of his powers and clothed the music in a beauty of poetical expression and a brillancy of coloring that was marvellous.

The concert on the whole was one of the most memorable of the present season.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 22 1914
Establishe

Paderewski to App Boston Sy

The Coming ed Pianist to Inf ning Will be the Most Importa son.—He Will Play His Own Co Steinert Concert Scheduled for



PADEREWSKI.
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Next Tuesday.

IN the local musical world Lent is proving, after all, not so dull and uninteresting since concerts of the highest musical character are a delightful feature of each week of the Lenten season. Special musical services, many of them of note, are being given in churches where music is a predominating feature and organ recitals are of frequent occurrence here and there to the delight of lovers of organ music.

The most important musical event of the current season will be the fifth Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 24, when the unique Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season as a soloist with the orchestra. It has been impossible this year to arrange a recital for him here and, therefore, Mr. Ellis put him in with the orchestra.

He will play his own Concerto in A-minor, the performances of which in Boston Friday afternoon, March 13, and Saturday evening, March 14, were by all odds the most sensational musical event in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Such piano playing and such orchestral work in connection with the playing almost passed belief. Dr. Muck and Mr. Paderewski were "in the vein" and as the Concerto came at the end of the concert, as it will here, Mr. Paderewski gave a small recital after the orchestra had left the stage.

Among the great pianist's many claims to fame is that he is the only artist who is allowed encores with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but in order to avoid breaking the continuity of the programme his appearance is always fixed for the last number.

The rest of the programme will warrant a great audience of itself. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F-minor, the most Russian of the great master's Symphonic works, and in many respects the most brilliant. It is in the Scherzo of this Symphony that Tschaikowsky transforms the string choir of his orchestra into a huge harp for not a bow is used. The other number on the programme will be the ever-popular "Tannhauser" Overture. This will be one of the few times Providence has an opportunity to hear Wagnerian music interpreted by the greatest living Wagnerian conductor, Dr. Muck. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in F-minor, No. 4 .... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhauser," .... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor, Op. 17 Paderewski

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25 1914

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENCE

Is Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert at Infantry Hall.

GIVEN FLATTERING RECEPTION

Crowd That Taxes Capacity of Auditorium Listens to Excellent Programme by Orchestra and Celebrated Pianist, Whose Efforts Arouse Enthusiasm.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphany No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17....................Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he waited for the opening bars to be played. Evidence there was of his recent ordeal in the nervous hands that held themselves in readiness to enter upon their task. But once the first note was struck much of that dropped away.

Brilliantly he played, and, as time lets no one stand still, so Paderewski has apparently changed. What he has lost in the fervency of youth, he has probably gained in maturity of judgment. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault, for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

o, too, must admiration be expressed Dr. Muck as he played upon his estra, expressing through his play- his own individuality and interpreta- of the composition, upon which Mr. erewski embroidered, with equal iancy, his own dazzling qualities, and ed to its vitality with a display of iancy and power.

ain and again the audience recalled at the close of the performance, wing enthusiastic bursts af applause r each movement; again and again owed his acknowledgment; again and n he grasped the conductor's hand, concert-meister's hand and bowed er acknowledgment.

ally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakes had his inspiration when he referre the "little more than a little" that i much too much." So there were th the audience that would have pre to remember Paderewski's playi his own concerto, than the enco which it must be confessed he show tendency to maltreat the piano. yet, all gratitude should be expresse his generosity after so brilliant a play.

The sixth and last concert of the son will be given on Tuesday eve April 14, when Miss Florence H will be the soloist. A. W.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
te MAR 25 1914

SALLIE WISTAR SAYS:

LAST autumn considerable grumbling was heard among musical people with regard to the embarrassment of harmonious riches, when both the opera company and the Boston Symphony Concert opened their respective season on the same night and, of course, at the same hour. It was regarded by some critics as an extraordinary slip on the part of one of the managements, and by others as a breach of fraternal etiquette on the part of authorities high up in musical affairs, especially as Farrar was the soloist for the Boston Symphony concert on that occasion, while Mary Garden sang her most important role, La Tosca, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At all events, it was deemed an imposition of hardship on the Philadelphia amateur who makes it a point to take in all that comes to the city that is worth while. As a fact, however, the Boston Symphony concert, which, in the opinion of most connoisseurs, is the choicest privilege of the musical season, drew a crowded house. From pit to dome the old Academy of Music was filled to its capacity, as is always the case when Doctor Karl Muck brings his 100 musicians to display to our admiration the remarkable product of many years of steady drilling, in illustration to the axiom: "Practice makes perfect."

How far the Metropolitan Opera House, with Garden as La Tosca, suffered from the competition is difficult exactly to compute under the existing habit now so prevalent in many places of "papering" the house—a process which is carried through without shears or paste—but it is none the less effective when it comes to disguising bare spots in an auditorium. However this may be, and whether the Metropolitan audience was truly profitable or not on that night, it made a brilliant showing. This nevertheless did not soothe the feelings of those who, being season subscribers to both the opera and the Boston Symphony concerts, had to relinquish one or the other of these rich, juicy, not to mention costly, treats.

ONE might think that, having done this once, the two managements would avoid in future such a conflict, which at best seems hardly courteous to one another and must be decidedly unfair to some of their most enthusiastic patrons. But the announcements of the five Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1914-15, opening on Monday, November 2, with Amato and Harold Bauer as soloists, show the selfsame disregard of common sense or of ordinary consideration for the subscribing public. For on November 2, likewise, the opera season is scheduled to open at the Metropolitan Opera House.

One might suppose that with 365 days to choose from the conflict might be avoided.

THIS reminds me of the two seven-masted schooners which some ten years ago or more were built almost simultaneously, one at Bath and the other at Camden, Me. They were noble looking ships as they glided in full sail on the water. The launching of both was attended with much ceremony and some solemnity.

There arose considerable rivalry between the shipyards, the owners and the captains. But the sea is spacious and open to all, and its broad expanses might be supposed to afford room and safety two schooners, even though they be [illegible] noble crafts plied their trade along the coast for a year or two and then something happened.

One summer I missed the great ship that was such an adornment to the view, and upon inquiry the information was forthcoming.

The two schooners one day had met along the coast, and whether—as 'twas said—through pugnacity on the part of their pigheaded captains, neither of whom would give way, or merely through a coincidence of misfortune and the difficulty of maneuvering so great a sailing craft, they collided and came to woeful grief.

With the entire Atlantic at their disposal, and only two of their class on the water, were this incident used in a novel in would seem a little far-fetched, would it not?

Morale—There's room enough for all—why collide? SALLIE WISTAR.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25 1914

BRILLIANT WORK BY PADEREWSKI

Memorable Concert by Great Pianist and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of the most brilliant concerts of many seasons in Infantry Hall, before an audience which far exceeded the seating capacity of the hall. The reason for the exceptionally large audience, as well as for the tense interest throughout the programme, was obviously to be found in the soloist of the occasio, Paderewiski. The programme was well calculated to please those who came for the exhibition of a singular puissant and widely-acclaimed personality, rather than for serious listening to a fine concert.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op 36.
(I.) Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
(II.) Andantino in modo do canzona.
(III.) Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
(IV.) Finale; Allegro con fuoco.

Wagner ....Overture, "Tannhauser"
Paderewski, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op 17.
(I.) Allegro.
(II.) Romanza Andante.
(III.) Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony does not contain the noblest and best that Tschaikowsky wrote, but it does contain much that is distinctly fine. The several subjects are treated interestingly and with some degree of originality and in the frenzied finale rise to heights of power. The scherzo, played pizzicato by the strings, was exquisite, and superbly done, to the immense delight of the audience. The wood-winds, however, on whom much depended, proved disappointing both here and in the concerto. The color and tone seemed to indicate carelessness.

The overture to "Tannhauser" was put in the middle of the programme, doubtless to dilute the good music for those who are unaccustomed to so much, but in spite of that it was the finest piece of music of the evening. Coming as it did from the middle period of Wagner's work, it does not show Wagner's powers at their highest point, but it is a piece of writing constantly popular and containing much of value. It was played excellently, with due regard for the contrasting passages of the pilgrims and the Venus mountain.

It is at the present time the tendency to brush aside as of slight worth the musical compositions of a virtuoso. It has been done notably in the case of three modern pianists—Busoni, D'Albert and Paderewiski. Much of Mr. Paderewiski's music is not to be treated so lightly, however, and the concerto is an example in point. In it he affords the soloist to be sure ample chances of showing what he can do with his fingers, wrist and forearm, but as has been shown, he gives the pianoforte only what it can best do, reserving for the orchestra most of the development. The true musician is always evident, and it demands to be listened to with the closest attention.

As a pianist, Mr. Paderewiski still remains in a class by himself. Others among the vast number of concert pianists possess the technical equipment; some few surpass him in that particular possibly, but he alone seems able to force out of whatever he plays all of beauty that is in it. He is perpetually piquant, exhiliarating and fully deserving of all his popularity. He is unequalled in the powerful eloquence and broad sweep of his playing.

According to his usual custom—a custom allowed only to Mr. Paderewski with the Boston Symphony—in response to insistent demand he played an encore. His selection, the "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," of Wagner, was rather unfortunate. In the sensuous constantly changing coloring, he could not hope in any transcription to equal the wonder of the original, a wonder of its kind never surpassed. And immediately after the orchestral concert, the effort was the more apparent. However, he played it superbly, magnificently. Never did he employ his power of making the piano sing, as he did then, but at the greatest climax there were moments when he "pounded" simply. Perhaps alone of all pianists can it be said that he rises above the possibilities of his instrument and at such a moment, the attempt to extract impossible power from the pianoforte, results in noise. At other times he rose to the full splendor of the composition and of his powers and clothed the music in a beauty of poetical expression and a brillancy of coloring that was marvellous.

The concert on the whole was one of the most memorable of the present season.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 22 1914

Paderewski to Appear in Boston Symphony Concert

The Coming [illegible]ed Pianist to Inf ning Will be the Most Importa son.—He Will Play His Own Co Steinert Concert Scheduled for

PADEREWSKI.
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Next Tuesday.

IN the local musical world Lent is proving, after all, not so dull and uninteresting since concerts of the highest musical character are a delightful feature of each week of the Lenten season. Special musical services, many of them of note, are being given in churches where music is a predominating feature and organ recitals are of frequent occurrence here and there to the delight of lovers of organ music.

The most important musical event of the current season will be the fifth Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 24, when the unique Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season as a soloist with the orchestra. It has been impossible this year to arrange a recital for him here and, therefore, Mr. Ellis put him in with the orchestra.

He will play his own Concerto in A-minor, the performances of which in Boston Friday afternoon, March 13, and Saturday evening, March 14, were by all odds the most sensational musical event in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Such piano playing and such orchestral work in connection with the playing almost passed belief. Dr. Muck and Mr. Paderewski were "in the vein" and as the Concerto came at the end of the concert, as it will here, Mr. Paderewski gave a small recital after the orchestra had left the stage.

Among the great pianist's many claims to fame is that he is the only artist who is allowed encores with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but in order to avoid breaking the continuity of the programme his appearance is always fixed for the last number.

The rest of the programme will warrant a great audience of itself. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F-minor, the most Russian of the great master's Symphonic works, and in many respects the most brilliant. It is in the Scherzo of this Symphony that Tschaikowsky transforms the string choir of his orchestra into a huge harp for not a bow is used. The other number on the programme will be the ever-popular "Tannhauser" Overture. This will be one of the few times Providence has an opportunity to hear Wagnerian music interpreted by the greatest living Wagnerian conductor, Dr. Muck. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in F-minor, No. 4.................................... Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhauser,"......... Wagner
Concerto in A-minor, Op. 17.. Paderewski

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 25

PADEREWSKI PLAYS FOR BIG AUDIENC

Is Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert at Infantry Hall.

GIVEN FLATTERING RECEPTION

Crowd That Taxes Capacity of Auditorium Listens to Excellent Programme by Orchestra and Celebrated Pianist, Whose Efforts Arouse Enthusiasm.

Announcement that Paderewski was to be the assisting soloist at the fifth concert in the Boston Symphony course, was sufficient to attract a record-breaking audience to Infantry Hall last evening, and not in the memory of symphony concerts has there been a larger or more enthusatstic gathering. With all the seats filled, as well as the stairs leading to the balcony and the steps in the balcony aisles, standing room was in demand and a row of enthusiasts stood against the wall down-stairs and in the balcony throughout the concert for the sake of hearing again the celebrity, who has come to be heralded as the world's greatest pianist.

But before that opportunity came, there was a performance by the orchestra that in itself was worthy of due consideration. As was to be expected with the appearance of so illustrious a soloist, Dr. Muck was present in person to conduct the orchestra through the intricacies of the programme, which was arranged in the following order:

Symphony No. 4, F-minor, Op. 36. Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco.

Overture, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Concerto in A-minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 17....................Paderewski
1. Allegro.
2. Romanza; Andante.
3. Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony is said to have been Tschaikowsky's favorite, and its melody, rhythm and color have endeared it to many nations. To be sure, the volatile French people have never accepted it kindly and complain that it will not wear, but it still continues to stir the cheerful American temperament, which responds to the touches of humor which have caused the composition to be regarded as a psychological paradox, written as it was during a period of intense mental depression. It was first produced in this country in New York in 1890, 12 years after its first performance in Moscow.

Last evening it was played with individuality from the brilliant opening of the first movement to the wild, barbaric beauty of the finale. Few symphonies allow so much play to the varied groups of instruments in turn and the variety and richness of tone color was well brought out. The symphony has great variety even to being occasionally commonplace, but probably the third movement was the greatest favorite with the majority of those present, who seemed to find especial enjoyment in the tricksy melody of the "pizzicato ostinato." Certain it is that ample applause greeted the conductor at the end of every movement, recalling him to his desk after he had disappeared from view.

For sheer beauty the second number on the programme, the familiar overture, "Tannhauser," was unsurpassed. The calm loveliness of the "Pilgrim's Chorus," the wild frenzy of the Bacchanalian music as a background, through which the themes were woven back and forth, were played with a delicacy and precision rising to a magnificent climax that were fully appreciated and duly recognized.

With the entrance of the pianist came the long-looked-for moment, and the cordialty of his reception could have left Paderewski no doubts as to his hold on the affection of those who had greeted him in all his appearances since he first came to the city nearly a score of years ago.

That the years have not passed him altogether lightly was apparent, as he waited for the opening bars to be played. Evidence there was of his recent ordeal in the nervous hands that held themselves in readiness to enter upon their task. But once the first note was struck much of that dropped away.

Brilliantly he played, and, as time lets no one stand still, so Paderewski has apparently changed. What he has lost in the fervency of youth, he has probably gained in maturity of judgment. At times last evening he played with much inspiration and with great beauty of tone, while at times, it must be confessed, he touched upon the fault, for which he was harshly criticized in the beginning of the season and played with over-much force.

It is evident that with the years he has lost nothing of the brilliancy of technique that won him fame. His concerto, which was played for the first time in this country by Mme. Julia Rive-King at a Symphony concert in Boston and played by the composer when he first visited that city in 1891, is still fresh, modern and beautiful.

As has been pointed out in its analysis, the greater part of its structure and development is confided to the orchestra, and one was reminded of the Arab sheik who, on hearing an orchestra in London for the first time, expressed especial admiration for the leader, "who played upon the invisible instrument with a stick."

So, too, must admiration [illegible] for Dr. Muck as he played upon his orchestra, expressing through his players, his own individuality and interpretation of the composition, upon which Mr. Paderewski embroidered, with equal brilliancy, his own dazzling qualities, and added to its vitality with a display of brilliancy and power.

Again and again the audience recalled him at the close of the performance, following enthusiastic bursts af applause after each movement; again and again he bowed his acknowledgment; again and again he grasped the conductor's hand, the concert-meister's hand and bowed further acknowledgment.

Finally the orchestra began to file slowly off the stage, but the plaudits continued; the audience stayed on, and at last after several tentative returns, the virtuoso returned to the piano; and as he seated himself a vast sigh went up from the throng, and almost as one man it was again seated.

Sometimes one feels that Shakespeare had his inspiration when he referred to the "little more than a little" that is "by much too much." So there were those in the audience that would have preferred to remember Paderewski's playing of his own concerto, than the encore, in which it must be confessed he showed a tendency to maltreat the piano. And yet, all gratitude should be expressed for his generosity after so brilliant a display.

The sixth and last concert of the season will be given on Tuesday evening, April 14, when Miss Florence Hinkle will be the soloist. A. W. C.

Cuvier, the great [illegible] naturalist, an

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date MAR 25 1914

, 1884

SALLIE WISTAR SAYS:

LAST autumn considerable grumbling was heard among musical people with regard to the embarrassment of harmonious riches, when both the opera company and the Boston Symphony Concert opened their respective season on the same night and, of course, at the same hour. It was regarded by some critics as an extraordinary slip on the part of one of the managements, and by others as a breach of fraternal etiquette on the part of authorities high up in musical affairs, especially as Farrar was the soloist for the Boston Symphony concert on that occasion, while Mary Garden sang her most important role, La Tosca, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At all events, it was deemed an imposition of hardship on the Philadelphia amateur who makes it a point to take in all that comes to the city that is worth while. As a fact, however, the Boston Symphony concert, which, in the opinion of most connoisseurs, is the choicest privilege of the musical season, drew a crowded house. From pit to dome the old Academy of Music was filled to its capacity, as is always the case when Doctor Karl Muck brings his 100 musicians to display to our admiration the remarkable product of many years of steady drilling, in illustration to the axiom: "Practice makes perfect."

How far the Metropolitan Opera House, with Garden as La Tosca, suffered from the competition is difficult exactly to compute under the existing habit now so prevalent in many places of "papering" the house—a process which is carried through without shears or paste—but it is none the less effective when it comes to disguising bare spots in an auditorium. However this may be, and whether the Metropolitan audience was truly profitable or not on that night, it made a brilliant showing. This nevertheless did not soothe the feelings of those who, being season subscribers to both the opera and the Boston Symphony concerts, had to relinquish one or the other of these rich, juicy, not to mention costly, treats.

ONE might think that, having done this once, the two managements would avoid in future such a conflict, which at best seems hardly courteous to one another and must be decidedly unfair to some of their most enthusiastic patrons. But the announcements of the five Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1914-15, opening on Monday, November 2, with Amato and Harold Bauer as soloists, show the selfsame disregard of common sense or of ordinary consideration for the subscribing public. For on November 2, likewise, the opera season is scheduled to open at the Metropolitan Opera House.

One might suppose that with 365 days to choose from the conflict might be avoided.

THIS reminds me of the two seven-masted schooners which some ten years ago or more were built almost simultaneously, one at Bath and the other at Camden, Me. They were noble looking ships as they glided in full sail on the water. The launching of both was attended with much ceremony and some solemnity.

There arose considerable rivalry between the shipyards, the owners and the captains. But the sea is spacious and open to all, and its broad expanses might be supposed to afford room and safety for two schooners, even though they be respective [illegible] noble crafts plied their trade along the coast for a year or two and then something happened.

One summer I missed the great ship that was such an adornment to the view, and upon inquiry the information was forthcoming.

The two schooners one day had met along the coast, and whether—as 'twas said—through pugnacity on the part of their pigheaded captains, neither of whom would give way, or merely through a coincidence of misfortune and the difficulty of maneuvering so great a sailing craft, they collided and came to woeful grief.

With the entire Atlantic at their disposal, and only two of their class on the water, were this incident used in a novel in would seem a little far-fetched, would it not?

Morale—There's room enough for all—why collide? SALLIE WISTAR.

IBUNE
Providence, R. I.
MAR 25 1914

BRILLIANT WORK BY PADEREWSKI

Memorable Concert by Great Pianist and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave one of the most brilliant concerts of many seasons in Infantry Hall, before an audience which far exceeded the seating capacity of the hall. The reason for the exceptionally large audience, as well as for the tense interest throughout the programme, was obviously to be found in the soloist of the occasio, Paderewiski. The programme was well calculated to please those who came for the exhibition of a singular puissant and widely-acclaimed personality, rather than for serious listening to a fine concert.

The programme was as follows:

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op 36.
(I.) Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima in movimento di valse.
(II.) Andantino in modo do canzona.
(III.) Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
(IV.) Finale; Allegro con fuoco.

Wagner ....Overture, "Tannhauser"
Paderewski, Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op 17.
(I.) Allegro.
(II.) Romanza Andante.
(III.) Allegro molto vivace.

The fourth symphony does not contain the noblest and best that Tschaikowsky wrote, but it does contain much that is distinctly fine. The several subjects are treated interestingly and with some degree of originality and in the frenzied finale rise to heights of power. The scherzo, played pizzicato by the strings, was exquisite, and superbly done, to the immense delight of the audience. The wood-winds, however, on whom much depended, proved disappointing both here and in the concerto. The color and tone seemed to indicate carelessness.

The overture to "Tannhauser" was put in the middle of the programme, doubtless to dilute the good music for those who are unaccustomed to so much, but in spite of that it was the finest piece of music of the evening. Coming as it did from the middle period of Wagner's work, it does not show Wagner's powers at their highest point, but it is a piece of writing constantly popular and containing much of value. It was played excellently, with due regard for the contrasting passages of the pilgrims and the Venus mountain.

It is at the present time the tendency to brush aside as of slight worth the musical compositions of a virtuoso. It has been done notably in the case of three modern pianists—Busoni, D'Albert and Paderewiski. Much of Mr. Paderewiski's music is not to be treated so lightly, however, and the concerto is an example in point. In it he affords the soloist to be sure ample chances of showing what he can do with his fingers, wrist and forearm, but as has been shown, he gives the pianoforte only what it can best de- reserving for the orchestra most of the development. The true musician is always evident, and it demands to be listened to with the closest attention.

As a pianist, Mr. Paderewiski still remains in a class by himself. Others among the vast number of concert pianists possess the technical equipment; some few surpass him in that particular possibly, but he alone seems able to force out of whatever he plays all of beauty that is in it. He is perpetually piquant, exhilarating and fully deserving of all his popularity. He is unequalled in the powerful eloquence and broad sweep of his playing.

According to his usual custom—a custom allowed only to Mr. Paderewski with the Boston Symphony—in response to insistent demand he played an encore. His selection, the "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," of Wagner, was rather unfortunate. In the sensuous constantly changing coloring, he could not hope in any transcription to equal the wonder of the original, a wonder of its kind never surpassed. And immediately after the orchestral concert, the effort was the more apparent. However, he played it superbly, magnificently. Never did he employ his power of making the piano sing, as he did then, but at the greatest climax there were moments when he "pounded" simply. Perhaps alone of all pianists can it be said that he rises above the possibilities of his instrument and at such a moment, the attempt to extract impossible power from the pianoforte, results in noise. At other times he rose to the full splendor of the composition and of his powers and clothed the music in a beauty of poetical expression and a brillancy of coloring that was marvellous.

The concert on the whole was one of the most memorable of the present season.

From TR UNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date MAR 22 1914
Established

Paderewski to Appear in Boston Symphony Concert

The Coming [illegible]ed Pianist to Inf ning Will be the Most Importa son.—He Will Play His Own Co Steinert Concert Scheduled for

PADEREWSKI.
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Next Tuesday.

IN the local musical world Lent is proving, after all, not so dull and uninteresting since concerts of the highest musical character are a delightful feature of each week of the Lenten season. Special musical services, many of them of note, are being given in churches where music is a predominating feature and organ recitals are of frequent occurrence here and there to the delight of lovers of organ music.

The most important musical event of the current season will be the fifth Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 24, when the unique Paderewski will make his only appearance of the season as a soloist with the orchestra. It has been impossible this year to arrange a recital for him here and, therefore, Mr. Ellis put him in with the orchestra.

He will play his own Concerto in A-minor, the performances of which in Boston Friday afternoon, March 13, and Saturday evening, March 14, were by all odds the most sensational musical event in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Such piano playing and such orchestral work in connection with the playing almost passed belief. Dr. Muck and Mr. Paderewski were "in the vein" and as the Concerto came at the end of the concert, as it will here, Mr. Paderewski gave a small recital after the orchestra had left the stage.

Among the great pianist's many claims to fame is that he is the only artist who is allowed encores with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but in order to avoid breaking the continuity of the programme his appearance is always fixed for the last number.

The rest of the programme will warrant a great audience of itself. The Symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F-minor, the most Russian of the great master's Symphonic works, and in many respects the most brilliant. It is in the Scherzo of this Symphony that Tschaikowsky transforms the string choir of his orchestra into a huge harp for not a bow is used. The other number on the programme will be the ever-popular "Tannhauser" Overture. This will be one of the few times Providence has an opportunity to hear Wagnerian music interpreted by the greatest living Wagnerian conductor, Dr. Muck. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in F-minor, No. 4.. Tschaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhauser,"........ Wagner
Concerto in A-minor, Op. 17.. Paderewski

[154]

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date APR 5 - 1914

A Season's Orchestral Concerts and What They Have Produced—Mr. Flagler and the New York Symphony.

THE several series of orchestral concerts that have furnished so large a part of the season's music in New York have been brought to a close. The number of such concerts has been very large; in the estimation of some, larger than the effective demand of the musical public can properly support. Under the most favorable circumstances, however, the proper number of such concerts is more or less a matter of opinion; for it is indisputably true that the highest class of orchestral music cannot be "supported" by paying audiences. They cannot be given without a subsidy of some kind.

It might be asked how many concerts are proper for a city of the population of New York. And this, in turn, would suggest an inquiry as to how large a proportion of that population is sufficiently interested in music to go to orchestral concerts. And there could be an inquiry respecting the proportion whose eagerness for music leads them to go to concerts and pay for their tickets. This inquiry will probably never be made; for the answer is known to be locked in the breasts of managers, whence wild horses could not drag it.

In this country the subsidy which makes orchestral concerts possible means the contributions which wealthy people are willing to make in order that the best orchestral music may continue to be given. That music does not pay for itself, and cannot be made to, even if the public fills the halls at regular prices; and deficits must be made up.

It is not long since the large sum needed to make up the annual deficit of the Philharmonic Society was published, and was then stated to be necessarily more than $80,000, of which the Pulitzer bequest can take care of only about a half. It is well known that the Boston Symphony Orchestra costs Mr. Henry L. Higginson a varying sum that has been as high as $40,000 or $50,000, perhaps more. The New York Symphony Society has been showing deficits of $50,000 to $60,000, which have been met by the collection of a guarantee fund from numerous subscribers. Now comes Mr. Henry Harkness Flagler, as was announced last week, who puts himself among the most public-spirited supporters of good music by declaring his readiness in future to make good by himself the annual deficit of the Symphony Society, of which he is President.

He has been a zealous promoter and a liberal supporter of its work for many years; and what he is about to do is only an extension and enlargement of the very practical interest he has hitherto taken in it.

The New York musical public is to be congratulated upon having a fellow citizen of this stuff. He clears the future of the Symphony Society from pecuniary difficulties which might have raised themselves along its path. A guarantee fund collected from many subscribers for a definitely limited period is a perilous reliance. Mr. Flagler removes the peril, and enables Mr. Damrosch and the managers of the organization to direct their attention wholly toward the artistic ends they have in view.

Mr. Flagler's action, which was taken with a modesty wholly characteristic, has been compared with what Mr. Pulitzer did for the Philharmonic Society. But it is rather to be compared with what Major Higginson, also in his lifetime, does for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He, to be sure, was a pioneer and an innovator. He created the Boston Symphony Orchestra after his own ideal, and called into life something the like of which had not existed in this country before. He set up a standard toward which others, like minded, have been striving. It is a more than twice-told tale, but it bears repetition. Mr. Flagler let it be known that he would defray the annual deficit of the Symphony Society, not only as it stands at present but with allowance for future expansion, if necessary in continuing the work of the orchestra on a high artistic plane. It is furthermore understood, that [illegible] arrange

---

MONITOR,
MARCH 28, 1914

Compositions of French, German and Russian School on Symphony Rehearsal Program Interpreted by Karl Muck

TONE POEM PLEASES

Presenting the Schumann symphony in B flat major, No. 1, op. 38, the D'Indy tone poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," op. 61, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," op. 34, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, gave its nineteenth public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and won the applause of a large audience. The three compositions, being typical products of the German, French and Russian schools of musical thinking, were an excellent summary of the progress of romanticism in northern Europe since Beethoven and Schubert.

The remotest of them in date, the symphony, and the one which is contemporary with the interpreters, the tone poem, were played first and second and thereby a striking contrast was attained. The last one, illustrating the knack of Russian composers for taking over the methods of men of other nationalities and accommodating them to their needs, was with good reason in subordinate position. For while Rimsky-Korsakoff in sentiment is a Slav, in his attitude toward his instrument and his handling of his tone colors he is half Teuton and half Gaul. Two music-makers of original style and one of adapted style were thus set in array.

As is the rule with Dr. Muck's programs, each work was presented with equal care. The "Spanish Caprice" was not played last just because in that position it could be excusably given a rough and ready reading. The presentation of the three pieces was as careful as the selection and grouping of them. But interpretation in all three cases was not equally impressive. The smallest triumph of the day was the symphony. It is remarkable that Schumann, the rejoicing, brooding poet, the hopeful-thinking, cautious-treading philosopher, should elude portrayal under Dr. Muck's baton and that only the outlandish craftsman and the writer of note combinations that unsettled the classic formulas of structure should be in evidence. The man of mood, the seer desirous of explaining the world to itself was not there.

At least he was not made to show himself in the first half of the symphony. And if he could not be persuaded or charmed out of hiding in the allegro and andante, of course he could not be laughed out in the scherzo. Dr. Muck has been too much the mere mechanician, the correct producer of sound and the unimpeachable marker of rhythm in symphonies of the standard mold before. He has more than once kept the human quality severely repressed until the time for laughter came. By so doing he has succeeded well in holding his house to the subject in hand. He has impressed his listeners with the expertness of his violinists and wood and brass players, he has shown what an orchestra can do in the way of virtuosity. But he has only astonished his audience. He has not moved it. Music read as the first two movements of the Schumann B-flat symphony were given on Friday afternoon is not interpretation. It is mere thrilling orchestral practise.

A wonderful development in clarity, precision and freedom, it must be admitted, the string sections and all sections of the orchestra have made in the past few months. The first violins are at times incredibly accurate and bold in swinging through a passage of bravura. And at times it almost seems as if the second violins were going to be a match for the first. But here only the means of interpretation are disclosing themselves. Schumann is the least likely of all composers to yield up anything valuable under such virtuoso treatment.

An interpretation of extraordinary beauty Dr. Muck and his men gave to the D'Indy tone poem. If the sacrifice of Schumann helped any in the accomplishment of this result, perhaps it was worth while. Dr. Muck is admirable with the French composers like Franck and D'Indy who are nearest to the Germans in their methods. In the "Summer Day on the Mountain" he thought nothing of how his men played, he gave no heed to the pungency of his brass tone or to the limpidity of his violin tone. He was not interested in how things were done but in getting something said. He was equally admirable in the "Spanish Caprice" of the Russian composer. Dance-tune, descriptive scene and all the comedy of the music were brought out with exquisite effect.

TRANSCRIPT,
MARCH 28,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHUMANN'S SPRING AND D'INDY'S SUMMER

The German's Songful Symphony and the Frenchman's Recondite Tone-Poem—The Kinships and Contrasts of the Two—The Intruding and Different Rimsky-Korsakoff

EVERYONE, except perhaps Dr. Muck himself, rejoiced yesterday afternoon over Schumann's symphony of the spring. It had not been played at the Symphony Concerts for two or three seasons, but memory awoke at the first sound of the upspringing and elate trumpet calls. It had never been played in Boston before under Dr. Muck and he spared not to make the music glow with Schumann's rapturous excitement and full-voiced song. The orchestra answered him as though it were glad with the rest. The brass choir gave him back their brightest and most energetic sonorities. The wood-winds sang with Schumann or twined their arabesques around the song allotted to the other instruments. The darker strings deepened the singing voices or sang full-throatedly by themselves. The tone of the violins was as shimmering as the spring lights that Schumann, like Tristan, "heard" in fancy and as warm as his own moods. The voice of the whole orchestra was the feeling and imparting voice of Schumann's direct and intensified song, reflecting every suggestion of rhythm or accent from the pages of the score or the conductor's imagination, answering to every variation of the pace, speeding as Dr. Muck willed, yet never slipping. As for the audience, who among it unless he was some young and showy pedant from the music courses at Cambridge thought twice of Schumann's over-thickened, needlessly blurred and occasionally gasping instrumentation, or cared a whit whether he was as expert in development or as neat and sure in symphonic design as the Mendelssohn whose Scotch Symphony, that same audience will hear next week. Nobody is quite sure nowadays whether the adept Felix had anything to say in his symphonies, however artfully and adroitly he said it. Beyond peradventure Schumann had something to sing in this symphony of the spring, plentifully and intensely. Next week Dr. Muck will fulfil a pious rite to a gentleman-like classic when he revives the Scotch Symphony. Schumann's symphony is too alive to need ceremony. It speaks for itself.

Moreover the music spoke with its fullest eloquence under Dr. Muck's hand. What private opinions of Schumann's symphonies he may entertain are neither here nor there. Having put the spring symphony on a programme, as once in so often catholicity binds him to do, his artistic conscience, his penetrating imagination and his sense of style bade him discover the true voice of the music and impart it. In the imparting he and the orchestra did a feat of virtuosity that surpassed the many of a more obvious sort that they flung off in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." Every discerning and expert conductor nowadays tries by shrewd adjustments of tone, balance and emphasis to clarify and make elastic Schumann's blurred harmonies and thick instrumentation even when they lead into a blind alley. Often Dr. Muck made Schumann's song and especially his transitions sound unusually plastic. At the same time he gave them an exceeding fulness of body and richness of voice. Time and again Schumann's singing tongue was as golden as St. Chrysostom's. The horn and trumpet calls of the first movement were both full and darting sonorities. They sounded as shafts of spring light look. Between them upleaped the melody and the song was as warm with elation. The pace quickened as by the mingled excitements of calls and song in interplay. Warm and rich indeed was the expanding and sustained song of the Larghetto; all the voices of the spring sang in it as with the deep joy of awakening earth and men. Even Nietzsche might have approved. The spring smiled and danced out of the light shadings and the sublimated rhythms of the scherzo. The finale piled elation upon elation, but still light-heartedly. Now, whether Dr. Muck's pace departed from the tradition or not, whether he imagined too much or too little into the symphony, whether he made a lyric in tones almost a passionate hymn, the music did sound with Schumann's rapturous vision of the joys of the spring and of young hearts answering to it.

Though d'Indy's tone-poem of the day on the mountain stood between, the vivid contrast with Schumann's symphony came in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" at the other end of the programme. Hear a master of orchestral resources and with no small vein of instrumental imagination besides, making light, bold, vivid play with his timbres, contrasting, blending, dividing and differentiating them like a juggler. Watch him turning also the kaleidoscope of his harmonic background. The music reels or languishes to the conventional rhythms of Spanish music which are hardly those courted by the Spaniards themselves or by composers that know their Spain like Debussy and Laparra. Not a tint that conventional Spanish music requires is lacking in Rimsky-Korsakoff's harmonic and orchestral palette. He sets fragments of melodies dancing like puppets or he lets the melody expand like a canvas upon which to ply his colors. The ear drinks in the heady wine of this virtuosity, of this technical exercise in far-flung and not very real fancy. "The Spanish Caprice," played to the hilt—and a very finely chiselled hilt it was yesterday—is dry mental and nervous excitement to hear. Schumann is a clumsy amateur in orchestral technique beside the Russian; but the song that he sings with an intensity that beats down every obstacle goes from the heart to the heart. It is human and "The Spanish Caprice" under all its shamming exterior, is academic exercise. A great vision of the spring and man and woman in it, welled up in Schumann. Rimsky-Korsakoff considered Spain as musical material.

Perhaps it was this sincerity and intensity of human vision and emotion that related Schumann's spring symphony to d'Indy's tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain" much more than the mere extraneous kinship that the titles and a common quality of music of light, air and landscape imply. Neither is delineative in our forced modern sense, but both are music of the sensations of the spirit in nature out of doors. In workmanship in the lower and the higher sense d'Indy and Schumann are poles apart. Schumann hesitates often harmonically and speaks sometimes a stammering instrumental speech. D'Indy is practised master of such means as experience and imagination alike provide them. Schumann is, perforce, simple; d'Indy is almost instinctively recondite. He has all the intellectual faculties that may serve music. Design and proportion are second nature to him. The beginning implies the end to his far-seeing mind. Invention with him is both mental and emotional process; while poor Schumann stumbled or leaped along whenever he caught a glimpse of the flying mantle of his inspiring vision.

Schumann's symphony of the spring is simple music; d'Indy's tone-poem of the mountain and summer sounds, lights and sensations, has its abstruse side. Yet as the intensity, the sincerity, the humanity make the simplicity conquer, so also do they make the abstruseness prevail, each according to its kind. D'Indy—not Satan but saint—leads his hearers up into a high mountain and shows the vision in tones of sunrise illuminating and reanimating the world. It is not merely gorgeous tonal rhetoric as sometimes the stupendous sunrise of "Zarathustra" seems and as all the imitations of it surely are. Rather it is very finely observed, imagined and accomplished tone-picturing—the tremulously expectant darkness, the mounting light, the deepening shadows, the darting rays, the answering quiver of the awakening earth, the slow surge of light upon the world, of the world into living again, and of sensation upon him who sees and feels. Therein is the emotion of the song that penetrates d'Indy's imaginative delineation, floods it and sublimates it. In the song is the vision and the emotion of mind and heart watching the daily miracle of a sleeping world waked by the light. Out of the song they possess those that hear.

It is so again when at the end of the tone-poem, the beholding and feeling composer still stands on the mountain and sees the light recede, the shadows of evening creep over the world, the mantle of silence enwrap it. The tone-picturing is briefer and scantier. A little suggestion suffices at the beginning; for the picture of dark and stillness subduing the world and the sensation of peace are as one in d'Indy's mind and heart, felt so deeply, expressed so intensely and sincerely that they enter no less into the hearer to bring him through tones the emotion of another daily miracle. Between, the composer muses in the afternoon light in the solitude of the mountain slope, and how vividly on its delineative side the music express the sense at such a moment of dreamy physical and spiritual well-being. He muses and now and again the sounds of the daily life in the world below drift up to him. They are half-real and half-idealized and the music is vivid of the two-fold sensation that they thus bring. They melt into the composer's musing; the musing intensifies; it becomes the spiritual longing and aspiration, more real than reality in such souls as d'Indy's, and their music is their hymn. Out of d'Indy's heart it sings in the hearer's. So once more are symphony and tone-poem akin in their imparting.

H. [illegible]

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 11, 1914.

CLAPP'S SYMPHONY.

Its Presence Difficult to Explain.

Dr Muck Gives Pleasure in Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite.

It has been said that no man has revealed his soul even to his dearest friend —until he has written a symphony. Mr Philip Greeley Clapp has disclosed a fine mind, well-tempered sensibilities and excellent understanding in the words that he has contributed to current literature on musical topics. He is a young man, and does not blush to name the month and day of his birth, which occurred 26 years ago. Whatever part the doings of yesterday may play in his subsequent career, they at least will neither make or unmake it, and in this reflection there should be much comfort.

The account of Mr Clapp's scholastic attainments has been printed and it would be one to command respect and admiration in a man years his senior. His record at Harvard has been a brilliant one and holds much of promise. Had Mr Clapp's new symphony in E minor, played yesterday afternoon at the 21st rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from manuscript and for the first time anywhere, proved a commendably thoughtful and spontaneous, if not a startling, world-shaking effort bristling with genius, a work holding modest but genuine promise of mature attainments, there would have been general and sincere although quiet rejoicing.

On the contrary, after spending an hour and a quarter listening to the thoughts of Mr Clapp as offered in the form of a symphony to a serious-minded public, one is compelled to conclude that if such utterances are the spontaneous and inevitable output of his musical inspiration, he is not only suffering from some grave mental disturbance but that he is a dangerous man to the community. No brain could harbor the chaotic ingredients which churned about the orchestra yesterday afternoon without imminent danger at some time of an explosion.

It may be that Mr Clapp realized various things during the course of the week—for conducting his piece himself, he rehearsed it, and it is said with much diligence, even urging the players to practice their parts at home. No man could listen to page after page, even had he written them, without confessing how drearily irrelevant and incongruous they are, how futile and ridiculous are devices evidently supposed to have serious, even tragic significance, how devoid is the whole prolix score from cover to cover of any single bar containing a beautiful, convincing or arresting idea, except the first few measures of the slow movement, wherein Mr Clapp for a few seconds has permitted himself a melodic line, a reasonably intelligible diatonic harmony and a fleeting continuity of thought.

It may be also that in the course of rehearsals the composer realized that constant din of bass drum and cymbals is not dramatic accentuation, that there is a limit of nervous endurance to a dissonance brazenly defying resolution, that there should be a State law making an organ point of more than 10 minutes punishable with a month in jail, that it does not necessarily show musicianship to devise notes for the violins like a puzzle that challenge and harass a reasonably efficient technic, or others for the first trumpet to see if perchance he will burst a blood vessel, as though the composer in writing his work should say: "This is too simple, too obvious, too trite. At all costs I must escape the charge of unsophistication."

There were moments in the last movement when the orchestra while tuning up has had quite as much emotional or intellectual import. Indeed, there were few moments when Mr Clapp, had he harmonized simply and honestly an exercise in Mr Chadwick's textbook for any one of the inversions of a dominant seventh chord, asked the orchestra to play the same, would not have merited general thanks.

There are occasions when, in the matter of soloists or works, a compromise with the traditional and cherished standards of the orchestra is expedient or necessary. But it would not be easy to find any reasonable excuse why such a studied, incoherent and tortured succession of sounds—the reminiscences of Mr Puccini notwithstanding — should ever have been launched in a Symphony program or foisted upon a Symphony audience.

Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1, followed. There was much pleasure to be derived from the manner in which Dr Muck played it, even as there was admonition of what might be accomplished by a composer even though he should not demand four oboes, four clarinets, eight horns, four trumpets, four trombones and other apparatus to swell the number and the sound of notes.

---

his plaintive strument

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 11, 1914

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Phillip G. Clapp's Effort Presented by Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first symphony of Philip G. Clapp of this city was performed yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conducted by the composer. Mr. Clapp, who is now in his early twenties, graduated from the music courses at Harvard in 1909, and travelled in Europe for two years as a beneficiary of the Frederick Sheldon Fellowship. Returning to America, he obtained his degree of Ph. D. by means of compositions and research conducted in Europe. He has quickly gained a high standing as a musician and a teacher in the community, and with reason, for his accomplishments are more than considerable for so young a man. It is because of this fact that we intend to express frankly our impressions of the symphony performed yesterday.

OUTSIDE INFLUENCES

For that symphony is plainly the result of over much theoretical work, reading of modern scores, and similar outside influences, and Mr. Clapp has shown in the past that he has more than enough knowledge and ability to enable him to follow a course more truly his own, and one which will advance him artistically much farther than the path he now follows in an intricate pretentious, badly constructed and empty composition.

This symphony is for a huge orchestra. It is very seriously composed, and elaborately planned, and unfortunately a huge mass of hair-splitting detail interferes completely with the proportion and the continuity of the music and successfully obscures what should be the broad lines of a composition of monumental proportions. Piece by piece this symphony is composed. On paper, it is carefully and ingeniously put together; in performance it has almost no actual coherence or balance or completeness of effect. The sense of beginning, continuance and conclusion is not inherent in any one of the four movements. Furthermore, few of the melodic ideas have individuality. An effective phrase here, an instrumental effect there, are interesting, but the interest on the part of the hearer is short-lived, as there is no connected, cumulative result. Moreover, certain instrumental effects, such as harp glissandos, acidulous passages for the wood in high registers, an excessive use of percussion instruments, and, in spite of the greatly augmented orchestra, a general lack of clarity and contrast in the instrumentation, are prevalent; and few of the harmonic or orchestral effects of which Mr. Clapp is so fond escape the reproach of displaying some of the worst mannerisms of much of the music being composed today.

Elaborate Instrumentation

The instrumentation is elaborately contrived, and it may be said for the composer that although he has reinforced his orchestra in the brass and woodwind and percussion about as much as the law allows, he has intended his instruments for purposes of color rather than of deafening sonority.

It would be a pleasure to say that this symphony shows an advance upon the early symphonic poem of Mr. Clapp, "Norge," which was effective by reason of its audacity, its bold and spontaneous manner, and its brilliant handling of the orchestra, when performed by the Pierian Sodality orchestra and by the Boston Symphony some seasons ago, under Mr. Fiedler, in Cambridge. But this cannot be said. Where there was a propulsive musical current and youthful exuberance and conviction which spoke most promisingly for the future, there is here a lack of clearness and logic in development, a lack of individuality of style or subject matter, a lack of distinctive coloring, a lack of nearly everything except a great deal of theoretical knowledge. It is natural that in composing for a great orchestra a young man of today should indulge in many instruments and a certain pretentiousness. Megalomania is a modern trait. But this symphony lacks flesh and blood, and its extravagances are cerebral rather than spontaneous or emotional, and that logic of inspiration which may defy the grammars and the [illegible] of elders, but convince be- [illegible] and vitality that [illegible]

Promising Future

Mr. Clapp has everything before him. He has now enjoyed the remarkable opportunity of hearing his music in actual performance, and that by an orchestra which should not have been called upon to spend its energies upon such immature music. This is not meant as a reflection upon the sincerity of Mr. Clapp and his very considerable attainments. He will write other music, and he will write better music when he has forgotten a portion of what he knows, and is impressed less with the musical manners of certain present day composers, especially those of modern Germany.

Mr. Clapp was recalled several times by a friendly audience. Following his symphony, there was a generally brilliant performance of the First L'Arlesienne suite of Bizet—a model of style for composers old and young.

JOURNAL

APRIL 11, 1914.

CONCORD FIGHT SUGGESTED IN NEW SYMPHONY

Philip Greeley Clapp Conducts His Composition at Symphony Hall.

Philip Greeley Clapp, formerly of Boston, but now of Concord, conducted his new symphony yesterday at Symphony Hall. The work is typical of the present period of green wigs, orchestral imitations of Niagara and the Tower of Babel and composers with A. B.'s from the don't-you-dare-to-be-melodious school.

The symphony has no program, but as it was written between May, 1910, and September, 1913, it cannot possibly be taken as a tone picture of the recent school board conflict in Concord. It suggests trouble of many kinds, but it is a question whether it contains any local color. It calls for nearly all the instruments in the catalogue, including organ, military drum, castanets, glockenspiel, xylophone, tam-tam and tambourine, not to mention the usual full string and wood wind choirs.

The young composer was rewarded with friendly applause.

Dr. Muck then conducted the orchestra in the suite Bizet made from his music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

The program for next week's Symphony concerts includes Herman Goetz's symphony in F, the Loeffler tone poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles;" Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture and airs by Back, Gluck and Verdi, which will be sung by Mme. Louise Homer.

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 11, 19

MR. CLAPP CONDUCTS HIS NEW SYMPHONY

MASS OF SOUND HIDES THE COMPOSER'S THEMES

Despite Stupendous Aggregation of Instruments, the Work Is Depressing.

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme:—

Clapp..................Symphony in E minor (MS.)
First Performance.
Conducted by the Composer.
Bizet....................L'Arlesienne. Suite No. 1

Mr. Clapp's Symphony is scored for four flutes, two interchangeable with piccolo flutes; four oboes, two interchangeable with English horns; two small clarinets (the second ad libitum); three ordinary clarinets and a bass clarinet; four bassoons and a contra-bassoon; eight horns, the last four interchangeable with tubas; three trumpets and a bass trumpet; four trombones, contra-bass tuba; five kettle-drums; cymbals, triangle, tambourine; military drum, bass drum, castanets, glockenspiel, xylophone, tam-tam, two harps, organ (ad libitum), and the usual strings. This orchestra fairly equals, if it does not outstrip the orchestras of Mahler and Richard Strauss. It reads like one of the imaginative orchestras described by Berlioz in his Treatise on Instrumentation, and how he could have written for it had he had it to write for. The very pretentiousness of the orchestration of this Symphony leads us to expect a corresponding grandeur and importance in ideas which this stupendous aggregation of instruments is to produce.

We naturally anticipate some overwhelming climax, some inspiring, thrilling moments, something grotesque or bizarre even, but always something sharply defined, distinctive. Alas, we are doomed to disappointment. Mr. Clapp [illegible] encumbered by the vast orchestral

Mr. C[illegible] con[illegible] Symph[illegible] to the [illegible] He state[illegible] "the S[illegible] free [illegible]m, and an a[illegible] analysis would be difficult [illegible] on without thematic excerpts pub[illegible] the text." Possibly such "thematic excerpts" would help in the comprehension of this Symphony, but after all music is written to be heard. Themes must be in sufficient relief to be easily recognizable without the aid of programme notes. Musical ideas, whether we find them beautiful or not, must at least be distinctly and clearly enunciated.

But the themes of Mr. Clapp's Symphony are so deeply hidden in the mass of sound that they are for most part undistinguishable. From such a mass of instruments one naturally expects a vast sonority. By unskillful writing, however, Mr. Clapp makes his orchestra with its array of brass sound less sonorous in proportion, than does Haydn with only two horns and two trumpets. Mr. Clapp's orchestration is thick and lacks variety of color; in his climaxes it becomes noisy, rather than brilliant, in short amateurish. In short, the Symphony fails to produce other than a depressing effect. Obscurity, wilful complexity, pretentiousness, superficiality, these never make for good in any form of art, least of all in music which should be above all transparent, and sincerely expressive.

Mr. Clapp conducted without distinction. Such a work is least of all unfitted for other than a conductor of long experience. The orchestra played remarkably. Such music is extraordinarily difficult of execution, and this difficulty is not often appreciated by audiences.

Bizet's L'Arlesienne is familiar, yet never has it sounded so refreshing as yesterday. Such clearness of expression and sincerity of sentiment can never be too much praised.

The performance of this Symphony by Mr. Clapp causes one to reflect on the present trend of American music. As a composition it is eminently typical of the tendencies of a certain school (if school it may be called) of young American composers, and clearly shows what results may be looked for if these tendencies are encouraged.

Within the last few years there has been a loud call for music distinctively American. Looking with pride at past rapid achievements in commercial pursuits, the attainment of distinction in the art of music would seem at first sight to be a problem easy of solution. Apparently, with characteristic American spirit and self assurance, so think many of our younger composers.

Scorning to begin simply and at the beginning as the composers of other nations have done, and little realizing that artistic progress, really worthy of the name, is the painful, careful work of years, these young American composers have attempted to take up the Art of Music at the point where the masters of the Modern School have left it. It is not apparent to them that a Debussy (for example) occupies his high place among the masters and is fitted to carry on the banners of progress, not altogether for the sake of his own genius alone, but also because of his long artistic descent; that he is what he is in French art primarily because of the long line of French composers dating from Rameau and Couperin, which has preceded him; and that without such an artistic ancestry he would be little short of an absurdity in the artistic world.

To create such an artistic ancestry for American composers will require patient plodding for many years to come. They must be content for a long time yet to sit at the feet of the masters of the great European schools, realizing, however, that the time is not yet come when they may follow them in their higher flights. Such attempts as Mr. Clapp's Symphony, for example, are foredoomed to failure and can do naught but prejudice the general musical public against the American composer. This musical public, if left to its own devices, will welcome, we feel sure, any composition which is sincere, unpretentious and well written, whether the author be American, German, Italian or French, and in this way American music will naturally take its proper place without artificial assistance or forcing of any sort.

The time is not yet come when the American composer can attempt the exploration of new paths in his art. He should be content to follow his leaders, choosing carefully that which is best in their work and avoiding the imitation of their exaggerations and eccentricities.

F. S. M.

BOSTON GLOBE—
APRIL 11, 1914.

CLAPP'S SYMPHONY.

Its Presence Difficult to Explain.

Dr Muck Gives Pleasure in Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite.

It has been said that no man has revealed his soul even to his dearest friend —until he has written a symphony. Mr Philip Greeley Clapp has disclosed a fine mind, well-tempered sensibilities and excellent understanding in the words that he has contributed to current literature on musical topics. He is a young man, and does not blush to name the month and day of his birth, which occurred 26 years ago. Whatever part the doings of yesterday may play in his subsequent career, they at least will neither make or unmake it, and in this reflection there should be much comfort.

The account of Mr Clapp's scholastic attainments has been printed and it would be one to command respect and admiration in a man years his senior. His record at Harvard has been a brilliant one and holds much of promise. Had Mr Clapp's new symphony in E minor, played yesterday afternoon at the 21st rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from manuscript and for the first time anywhere, proved a commendably thoughtful and spontaneous, if not a startling, world-shaking effort bristling with genius, a work holding modest but genuine promise of mature attainments, there would have been general and sincere although quiet rejoicing.

On the contrary, after spending an hour and a quarter listening to the thoughts of Mr Clapp as offered in the form of a symphony to a serious-minded public, one is compelled to conclude that if such utterances are the spontaneous and inevitable output of his musical inspiration, he is not only suffering from some grave mental disturbance but that he is a dangerous man to the community. No brain could harbor the chaotic ingredients which churned about the orchestra yesterday afternoon without imminent danger at some time of an explosion.

It may be that Mr Clapp realized various things during the course of the week—for conducting his piece himself, he rehearsed it, and it is said with much diligence, even urging the players to practice their parts at home. No man could listen to page after page, even had he written them, without confessing how drearily irrelevant and incongruous they are, how futile and ridiculous are devices evidently supposed to have serious, even tragic significance, how devoid is the whole prolix score from cover to cover of any single bar containing a beautiful, convincing or arresting idea, except the first few measures of the slow movement, wherein Mr Clapp for a few seconds has permitted himself a melodic line, a reasonably intelligible diatonic harmony and a fleeting continuity of thought.

It may be also that in the course of rehearsals the composer realized that constant din of bass drum and cymbals is not dramatic accentuation, that there is a limit of nervous endurance to a dissonance brazenly defying resolution, that there should be a State law making an organ point of more than 10 minutes punishable with a month in jail, that it does not necessarily show musicianship to devise notes for the violins like a puzzle that challenge and harass a reasonably efficient technic, or others for the first trumpet to see if perchance he will burst a blood vessel, as though the composer in writing his work should say: "This is too simple, too obvious, too trite. At all costs I must escape the charge of unsophistication."

There were moments in the last movement when the orchestra while tuning up has had quite as much emotional or intellectual import. Indeed, there were few moments when Mr Clapp, had he harmonized simply and honestly an exercise in Mr Chadwick's textbook for any one of the inversions of a dominant seventh chord, asked the orchestra to play the same, would not have merited general thanks.

There are occasions when, in the matter of soloists or works, a compromise with the traditional and cherished standards of the orchestra is expedient or necessary. But it would not be easy to find any reasonable excuse why such a studied, incoherent and tortured succession of sounds—the reminiscences of Mr Puccini notwithstanding—should ever have been launched in a Symphony program or foisted upon a Symphony audience.

Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," suite No. 1, followed. There was much pleasure to be derived from the manner in which Dr Muck played it, even as there was admonition of what might be accomplished by a composer even though he should not demand four oboes, four clarinets, eight horns, four trumpets, four trombones and other apparatus to swell the number and the sound of notes.

Abercrombie's, which [illegible] 62½ oun[illegible]
Cuvier, the great [illegible] naturalist, an[illegible]

---

his plaintive i[illegible]
strument

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 11, 1914

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Phillip G. Clapp's Effort Presented by Dr. Muck

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first symphony of Philip G. Clapp of this city was performed yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and conducted by the composer. Mr. Clapp, who is now in his early twenties, graduated from the music courses at Harvard in 1909, and travelled in Europe for two years as a beneficiary of the Frederick Sheldon Fellowship. Returning to America, he obtained his degree of Ph. D. by means of compositions and research conducted in Europe. He has quickly gained a high standing as a musician and a teacher in the community, and with reason, for his accomplishments are more than considerable for so young a man. It is because of this fact that we intend to express frankly our impressions of the symphony performed yesterday.

OUTSIDE INFLUENCES

For that symphony is plainly the result of over much theoretical work, reading of modern scores, and similar outside influences, and Mr. Clapp has shown in the past that he has more than enough knowledge and ability to enable him to follow a course more truly his own, and one which will advance him artistically much farther than the path he now follows in an intricate pretentious, badly constructed and empty composition.

This symphony is for a huge orchestra. It is very seriously composed, and elaborately planned, and unfortunately a huge mass of hair-splitting detail interferes completely with the proportion and the continuity of the music and successfully obscures what should be the broad lines of a composition of monumental proportions. Piece by piece this symphony is composed. On paper, it is carefully and ingeniously put together; in performance it has almost no actual coherence or balance or completeness of effect. The sense of beginning, continuance and conclusion is not inherent in any one of the four movements. Furthermore, few of the melodic ideas have individuality. An effective phrase here, an instrumental effect there, are interesting, but the interest on the part of the hearer is short-lived, as there is no connected, cumulative result. Moreover, certain instrumental effects, such as harp glissandos, acidulous passages for the wood in high registers, an excessive use of percussion instruments, and, in spite of the greatly augmented orchestra, a general lack of clarity and contrast in the instrumentation, are prevalent; and few of the harmonic or orchestral effects of which Mr. Clapp is so fond escape the reproach of displaying some of the worst mannerisms of much of the music being composed today.

Elaborate Instrumentation

The instrumentation is elaborately contrived, and it may be said for the composer that although he has reinforced his orchestra in the brass and woodwind and percussion about as much as the law allows, he has intended his instruments for purposes of color rather than of deafening sonority.

It would be a pleasure to say that this symphony shows an advance upon the early symphonic poem of Mr. Clapp, "Norge," which was effective by reason of its audacity, its bold and spontaneous manner, and its brilliant handling of the orchestra, when performed by the Pierian Sodality orchestra and by the Boston Symphony some seasons ago, under Mr. Fiedler, in Cambridge. But this cannot be said. Where there was a propulsive musical current and youthful exuberance and conviction which spoke most promisingly for the future, there is here a lack of clearness and logic in development, a lack of individuality of style or subject matter, a lack of distinctive coloring, a lack of nearly everything except a great deal of theoretical knowledge. It is natural that in composing for a great orchestra a young man of today should indulge in many instruments and a certain pretentiousness. Megalomania is a modern trait. But this symphony lacks flesh and blood, and its extravagances are cerebral rather than spontaneous or emotional, and that logic of inspiration which may defy the grammars and the [illegible] of elders, but convince be[illegible] and vitality that [illegible]

Promising Future

Mr. Clapp has everything before him. He has now enjoyed the remarkable opportunity of hearing his music in actual performance, and that by an orchestra which should not have been called upon to spend its energies upon such immature music. This is not meant as a reflection upon the sincerity of Mr. Clapp and his very considerable attainments. He will write other music, and he will write better music when he has forgotten a portion of what he knows, and is impressed less with the musical manners of certain present day composers, especially those of modern Germany.

Mr. Clapp was recalled several times by a friendly audience. Following his symphony, there was a generally brilliant performance of the First L'Arlesienne suite of Bizet—a model of style for composers old and young.

JOURNAL-

APRIL 11, 1914.

CONCORD FIGHT SUGGESTED IN NEW SYMPHONY

Philip Greeley Clapp Conducts His Composition at Symphony Hall.

Philip Greeley Clapp, formerly of Boston, but now of Concord, conducted his new symphony yesterday at Symphony Hall. The work is typical of the present period of green wigs, orchestral imitations of Niagara and the Tower of Babel and composers with A. B.'s from the don't-you-dare-to-be-melodious school.

The symphony has no program, but as it was written between May, 1910, and September, 1913, it cannot possibly be taken as a tone picture of the recent school board conflict in Concord. It suggests trouble of many kinds, but it is a question whether it contains any local color. It calls for nearly all the instruments in the catalogue, including organ, military drum, castanets, glockenspiel, xylophone, tam-tam and tambourine, not to mention the usual full string and wood wind choirs.

The young composer was rewarded with friendly applause.

Dr. Muck then conducted the orchestra in the suite Bizet made from his music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

The program for next week's Symphony concerts includes Herman Goetz's symphony in F, the Loeffler tone poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles;" Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture and airs by Back, Gluck and Verdi, which will be sung by Mme. Louise Homer.

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 11, 19

MR. CLAPP CONDUCTS HIS NEW SYMPHONY

MASS OF SOUND HIDES THE COMPOSER'S THEMES

Despite Stupendous Aggregation of Instruments, the Work Is Depressing.

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme:—

Clapp..................Symphony in E minor (MS.)
First Performance.
Conducted by the Composer.
Bizet....................L'Arlesienne. Suite No. 1

Mr. Clapp's Symphony is scored for four flutes, two interchangeable with piccolo flutes; four oboes, two interchangeable with English horns; two small clarinets (the second ad libitum); three ordinary clarinets and a bass clarinet; four bassoons and a contra-bassoon; eight horns, the last four interchangeable with tubas; three trumpets and a bass trumpet; four trombones, contra-bass tuba; five kettledrums; cymbals, triangle, tambourine; military drum, bass drum, castanets, glockenspiel, xylophone, tam-tam, two harps, organ (ad libitum), and the usual strings. This orchestra fairly equals, if it does not outstrip the orchestras of Mahler and Richard Strauss. It reads like one of the imaginative orchestras described by Berlioz in his Treatise on Instrumentation, and how he could have written for it had he had it to write for. The very pretentiousness of the orchestration of this Symphony leads us to expect a corresponding grandeur and importance in ideas which this stupendous aggregation of instruments is to produce.

We naturally anticipate some overwhelming climax, some inspiring, thrilling moments, something grotesque or bizarre even, but always something sharply defined, distinctive. Alas, we are doomed to disappointment. Mr. Clapp [illegible] encumbered by the vast orchestral [illegible]

Mr. C[illegible] con[illegible] [illegible]ysis of his Symph[illegible] to the programme book. He state[illegible] "the Symphony is very free in form, and an adequate technical analysis would be difficult of comprehension without thematic excerpts published in the text." Possibly such "thematic excerpts" would help in the comprehension of this Symphony, but after all music is written to be heard. Themes must be in sufficient relief to be easily recognizable without the aid of programme notes. Musical ideas, whether we find them beautiful or not, must at least be distinctly and clearly enunciated.

But the themes of Mr. Clapp's Symphony are so deeply hidden in the mass of sound that they are for most part undistinguishable. From such a mass of instruments one naturally expects a vast sonority. By unskillful writing, however, Mr. Clapp makes his orchestra with its array of brass sound less sonorous in proportion, than does Haydn with only two horns and two trumpets. Mr. Clapp's orchestration is thick and lacks variety of color; in his climaxes it becomes noisy, rather than brilliant, in short amateurish. In short, the Symphony fails to produce other than a depressing effect. Obscurity, wilful complexity, pretentiousness, superficiality, these never make for good in any form of art, least of all in music which should be above all transparent, and sincerely expressive.

Mr. Clapp conducted without distinction. Such a work is least of all unfitted for other than a conductor of long experience. The orchestra played remarkably. Such music is extraordinarily difficult of execution, and this difficulty is not often appreciated by audiences.

Bizet's L'Arlesienne is familiar, yet never has it sounded so refreshing as yesterday. Such clearness of expression and sincerity of sentiment can never be too much praised.

The performance of this Symphony by Mr. Clapp causes one to reflect on the present trend of American music. As a composition it is eminently typical of the tendencies of a certain school (if school it may be called) of young American composers, and clearly shows what results may be looked for if these tendencies are encouraged.

Within the last few years there has been a loud call for music distinctively American. Looking with pride at past rapid achievements in commercial pursuits, the attainment of distinction in the art of music would seem at first sight to be a problem easy of solution. Apparently, with characteristic American spirit and self assurance, so think many of our younger composers.

Scorning to begin simply and at the beginning as the composers of other nations have done, and little realizing that artistic progress, really worthy of the name, is the painful, careful work of years, these young American composers have attempted to take up the Art of Music at the point where the masters of the Modern School have left it. It is not apparent to them that a Debussy (for example) occupies his high place among the masters and is fitted to carry on the banners of progress, not altogether for the sake of his own genius alone, but also because of his long artistic descent; that he is what he is in French art primarily because of the long line of French composers dating from Rameau and Couperin, which has preceded him; and that without such an artistic ancestry he would be little short of an absurdity in the artistic world.

To create such an artistic ancestry for American composers will require patient plodding for many years to come. They must be content for a long time yet to sit at the feet of the masters of the great European schools, realizing, however, that the time is not yet come when they may follow them in their higher flights. Such attempts as Mr. Clapp's Symphony, for example, are foredoomed to failure and can do naught but prejudice the general musical public against the American composer. This musical public, if left to its own devices, will welcome, we feel sure, any composition which is sincere, unpretentious and well written, whether the author be American, German, Italian or French, and in this way American music will naturally take its proper place without artificial assistance or forcing of any sort.

The time is not yet come when the American composer can attempt the exploration of new paths in his art. He should be content to follow his leaders, choosing carefully that which is best in their work and avoiding the imitation of their exaggerations and eccentricities.

F. S. M.

From TIMES

HERALD. SATURDAY.

APRIL 11.

NEW SYMPHONY BY P. G. CLAPP PERFORMED

Has Some Fine Ideas—Lacks Flowing Lines—Has Restlessness That Racks Nerves.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Philip Greeley Clapp's Symphony in E minor (MS.), led by the composer, and Bizet's first suite from the incidental music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

Mr. Clapp, whose symphony was performed for the first time, has indisputable talent. One may applaud or deplore the use he has made of this talent; all will admit that he has not wrapped it in a napkin and buried it.

To some this symphony is wholly antipathetic. They honestly dislike it and are frank and strong in disapproval. There are others who are not so much disturbed by what he said as by "the nasty way he said it." There are a few, a very few, who, fearing lest a genius pass unrecognized, find everything in the music "wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful! and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping."

The composer demands an unusually large orchestra, two English horns, four clarinets and, if possible, five, besides a bass clarinet; eight horns (four interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), and everything in like proportion. We miss, however, the celesta, the sarrusophone and the tonitruant. A formidable orchestra is collected. The question is whether by these extra instruments the composer gains additional effects, whether true sonority is increased, whether the orchestration is not all the thicker in consequence.

The symphony is without a program. Mr. Clapp also says it is free in form and the chief theme dominates the whole work. It is surprising to some that a composer of old New England stock should be so ultra-modern in his ideas, but New Englanders of staid families have shown the spirit of revolt before Mr. Clapp began to take lessons in harmony. No sane hearer today demands that a composition be in the strict form dear to the Leipsic school or that the harmonic progressions and contrapuntal work be such as old Richter would have applauded.

There are some fine ideas in this symphony. The chief theme has decided character, a certain defiant pride. There is an imposing pedal in the first movement. The opening measures of the Adagio portray a mood and have a serene and thoughtful beauty. Here and there in the symphony are little bits of detail that fix the attention.

The salient faults of the work are the absence of flowing lines and of logical continuity; a perpetual restlessness that soon rasps the nerves; a writing for instruments without favor shown to their characteristic qualities; a lack of true dynamic and also emotional contrasts. There is too often a lack of style, taste, imagination.

Mr. Clapp no doubt thinks, or if you please, feels and hears his music this way. He has no desire to startle. He is inexorably grim in sincerity that does not court immediate applause. He might say that his idiom requires study on the part of the hearer. The hearer might reply that he does not find any idiom; that ideas, excellent in them-[illegible] are not broadly developed—I do not use "developed" in its strictly pedagogic sense; that after an inspiring thought there is undue attention paid [illegible]ential or extraneous and insignificant detail. He might also say that mannerisms are not ideas. He might wish the trick of starting phrases in the high positions of instruments and then leaping downwards were not so often repeated; that there were not so many pompously inconsequential sudden blasts and thumps of brass and pulsatile instruments.

The music is seldom euphonious. This swollen orchestra is not homogeneous or plastic. However clear Mr. Clapp's thoughts may be to him, he does not communicate them clearly to the hearer. However beautiful or impressive or dramatic they may now seem to him, the hearer, well disposed toward the composer, at the end is disappointed, for neither the musical thought nor the expression is sustained or greatly varied, and, after all, as Mozart said, music must sound. Mr. Clapp's dissonances do not disturb us because they are dissonances; they vex us because they are seldom beautiful, seldom effective.

Nor is the structure of the work impressive by reason of sure foundation and clearness of plan. For instance, there is no reason why the first movement should end so abruptly. Even in an ultra-modern symphony a reasonable anticipation of a close is not a vulgar commonplace. The second movement has also its surprises. Surprise may be the chief element of wit; it should not be a chief feature of a symphonic movement; and in music surprises quickly become stale, flat and unprofitable.

Dr. Muck conducted Bizet's charming suite. This music abounds in ideas felicitously expressed by simple means. It is to be regretted that a clarinet was substituted for a saxophone in the Prel-[illegible]e and the Minuetto, for the timbre of [illegible]xophone gives a peculiarly plain-

---

MONITOR, BOSTON.

APRIL 11, 1914

Boston Composer Appears at Head of Dr. Muck's Men Interpreting His First Orchestral Work of Large Structure

BIZET SUITE REVIVED

Producing from manuscript Philip Greeley Clapp's symphony No. 1 in E minor, with the composer conducting, the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its twenty-first public rehearsal on Friday afternoon to much applause. There was but one other number on the program, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1, which Dr. Muck conducted.

The chief points of excellence and of weakness in the new American symphony are easily noted by the most casual listener. They are those to be expected in the product of a country that is no more than half way on the road to a mastered expression of itself in music.

They are just the reverse of those to be expected of a nation that is only starting on the road to musical achievement. A people less advanced musically than Americans today, a people only beginning to see what the art of tone could do for it in stating its aspiration, would seize on interesting and appealing thoughts, but would be unable to develop them far. It would have some good things to say, but would have an imperfect way of saying them. It would be strong in idea and imperfect in technique. It would sing some songs of homely beauty. It would not, however, produce many compositions in abstruse form, or many that required an elaborate array of instruments to perform them. And what it did turn out would be graceless and ephemeral. On the one hand, it would make a perfect folk song, like "Swanee River." On the other hand, it would make some oratorios and symphonies that would be presented a few times and forgotten.

Such a people, conscious of its shortcomings, would soon look to the improvement of its technique. It would proceed to master form. It would compel tone resources into its possession. It would get hold of all the means of expression. In the process of getting them it might lose the knack of invention it had in the epoch of its first singing. It might exchange a little originality for a great deal of facility. And that seems to be about what the American people, if the Boston group of composers may be regarded as representing the American people, has done. The American composer, if Mr. Clapp can be taken to sum up national orchestral accomplishment, has at last learned his technique. He is no longer making an awkward struggle with symphonic and vocal forms. He can handle them as well as the Germans, Frenchmen and Italians to whom he has gone to school. In his E minor symphony Mr. Clapp is as much a master of the craft of scoring as Strauss, Debussy, Sibelius or any other composer of established acclaim. He is entitled to a chair in the assembly of the mastersingers. He is an orchestral mechanician of the first grade. He is doubtless, too, a master of formal design, even if he makes little application of his knowledge of it. He neglects symmetry, but probably from choice, not from lack of understanding of it. He may be accepted as an expert tonal architect, though one who works along no lines of defined style.

In other words, Mr. Clapp has all the means in the world with which to say interesting things, and yet he does not say them.

The fault is by no means his. For in a correct view it is not composers who bring music into existence. It is the people who listen. Where there is a desire for a picturing of the life of a country through symphonies, the symphonies come. Where there is a yearning for the expression of national sentiment through song, the songs come. Stephen Foster's plantation tunes have the merit of idea and originality because the American public of their epoch had ears for a message through the medium of the song form. Philip Greeley Clapp or some other composer in Boston or in some other city of the United States would write a symphony tomorrow possessing the merit of idea and of originality if the public of American listeners were desirous of hearing a declaration of their hopes and feelings in the symphonic form.

Dr. Muck, taking up the baton after Mr. Clapp, pleased the audience greatly with his interpretation of the four little pieces of Bizet's suite. He gave the music its rhythmical value in a remarkable way. If he did not enter deeply into its poetic melancholy he brought o[illegible] brilliantly.

1914

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 11.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. CLAPP'S MUSIC OF APPLIED SCIENCE

The Paradoxical Contrast Between the Material of His New Symphony and His Treatment of It—Eloquent and Distinctive Themes from Which Only Dry, Calculated, Scholarly and Scientific Music Rises—Process Without Emotion or Expression — The Moral of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne"

As Mr. Clapp led the Symphony Orchestra through his new symphony yesterday afternoon, the man curiously suggested the music. With his right hand he beat the measure in unfailing clearness and unflagging precision. He might have been conducting for the thousandth instead of the twentieth time, so composed and exact was he and so firm was his grip upon himself, his men and his music. His face was changeless in its expression of cool and confident earnestness. His left hand and arm remained fixed at his side in a fashion that a Prussian sergeant might have envied. They never stirred to indicate advance or recession, climax or contrast, accent or shading. As it seemed the conductor-composer had thought out the whole "reading" of his symphony, enjoined it wisely upon the orchestra, left nothing to chance and next to nothing to the emotion of the transmitting moment. The symphony ran its course as clearly and certainly as the sun across a sky unclouded from dawn to dark. The applause of friendly regard or cool admiration rewarded Mr. Clapp at each pause and at the close of the whole symphony—applause that was a little awkward because of the abruptness of the endings. In as cool acknowledgment, the poised composer received it. Yet no doubt he had emotions within.

There is emotion of a sort in Mr. Clapp's symphony—cool, reasoned, confident emotion—that reveals itself chiefly where, in ultra-modern symphonies by young composers, the listener expects least to find it. Mood and feeling stir in them, for the most part, when they begin to manipulate their themes, to ripen them into melodies, to set them in conflict, to put them in march whither imagination and passion may lead them. Their themes in themselves are little more than material for these revealing, amplifying and glorifying processes. In contrast, Mr. Clapp's manipulation is materialistic; while in his themes themselves is individual quality and clear emotion. When he first states them, as at the beginning of the symphony with the theme that is to dominate it, or at the beginning of the slow movement with the theme from which it is to spring, they outstand from the background; arrest the ear and fix themselves clearly and firmly upon mind and imagination. Individuality is in them and inner voices in particular give them character. Emotion is in them, too, even though it is a thoughtful emotion of the mind rather than a spontaneous upspringing of the spirit. They are less sensuous than they are cerebral; yet to be such need not and does not deprive them of mood and feeling.

More than one, too, is of unusual amplitude, not merely a melodic fragment to be developed, but a melody clearly outlined and self-contained. The principal theme, as the introduction discloses it, as it runs its course through the symphony, is unmistakably eloquent. It has even its suggestion of power. The main theme of the slow movement is as unmistakably beautiful, with the contemplative beauty of introspective mood translating itself into instrumental song that would be lyrical were it a little less austere. Even the main theme of the scherzo, which is primarily serviceable, and the secondary themes of the first movement, some of which are like unto it, have individual character. Moreover, almost all these themes are not only expressive in themselves, but fertile of what the technicians call "subsidiaries" and "variants" rich in possibilities of development, ranging and imaginative voice. True, these themes are not spontaneous or inevitable; they are obviously born of long and may be a little calculating meditation. But they have individuality, eloquence, mood and feeling, and they are rich in possibilities. Such themes are rare in these days in a young composer's first symphony. In them is the distinction of Mr. Clapp's music.

The design and the accomplishment of the symphony are at curious variance with the themes from which it springs. In them, Mr. Clapp is direct and eloquent, imaginative, emotional and individual. On the other hand in the development and the interplay of his music, he is intricate and baffling, writing often, as it seems, rather for the eye that analyzes his processes from the engraved page rather than for the ear that hears, understands and feels from moment to moment in the concert-room. For his years Mr. Clapp is erudite in music; he has the analytical mind and the scholarly temperament. If the making of music is not an exact science he seems often, in spite of his just disdain of orthodox form and academic symmetries, to wish that it were so. From his themes, he proceeds to write his symphony as though he were fulfilling a long list of specifications, imagined for it in the secrecy of his own scholarship and resource. It is possible to write a symphony that shall be "programme-less" music but that shall sound from beginning to end like a cumulating drama in tones. It is possible to write a symphony that shall be eloquent revelation in tones of mood and passion, of stress and conflict, victory or defeat born in the composer's spirit and entering into the spirit of those that hear. It is possible yet again to write a symphony as innocent of a "programme" as though it were written in 1714 and yet make it the poignant voice of universal human passion and pain, longing and elation.

Mr. Clapp's symphony is admittedly "programmeless," as he had a right to make it. Yet it need not have lacked so completely as it seems to lack at a single hearing any large and perceptible imaginative and emotional design. To introduction and opening allegro succeed a scherzo and trio; then a slow movement; then a finale. The introduction is brooding of mood; the diversified allegro that follows is alternately turbulent and reflective, and abrupt in both; the scherzo is now boisterous, now songful, and again march-like; the slow movement is a succession of variations upon a theme that in itself does not lack mood or beauty; the finale recapitulates and fuses all thematic material that has gone before and swells it into a tamely "triumphant" close of scholarly and scientific musical accomplishment. Thanks to its songful theme, the slow movement does communicate mood and feeling. There are moments of beauty and emotion in it. In the other three movements the moods are too fitful and obscured, too much mental concepts—as the philosophers say—rather than emotion released, concentrated and distilled to impress themselves upon the hearer. As the embodiment and enactment of a drama in tones, as revelation of an individual spirit, as a proclamation of universal human emotion the design and the accomplishment of Mr. Clapp's symphony are null. Often it seems as detached from an emotional or imaginative experience as logarithms themselves.

On the other ha[illegible] the [illegible]ymphony abounds in scholarly [illegible] design, resource and accomplishment. From beginning to end it seems planned to fulfill those imagined specifications and to the last letter it accomplishes them. Mr. Clapp is dryly adroit in the anticipation of the themes his listeners are soon to hear. He works out, with a scientific and engineering imagination, as it were, "subsidiaries" and "variants" of them. They undergo thoughtful and intricate transformations at his hands; they pass from movement to movement, and so knit the symphony together and sustain it. He draws them out finer and finer, more and more numerously and elaborately, until when he finally reassembles them at the beginning of the finale the impression upon the ear is very like the impression upon the eye of the cables of a suspension bridge about to be bound into their fastenings. The rest of the movement is the binding, for the most part tight upon the theme of the slow movement. Now all this is an interesting process to observe in music-making as its analogue is in bridge-building. To accomplish it as resourcefully, surely and completely as Mr. Clapp has done is no light achievement for the music-maker. It even argues a kind of imagination and a sort of creative faculty in him. But it remains a scientific process more impressive on the engraved page than in the actual voice of the music. Now the distinctive attribute of music is to sound and to be apprehended through the ear by mind and imagination. Far too much for the good of his symphony Mr. Clapp seems to conceive music, not as an expressive art, but as an applied science.

The engraved page, moreover, unless the reader has a very "hearing" eye, hides many a shortcoming and idiosyncrasy that the actual sounding of the music unsparingly reveals. Mr. Clapp assembles a very large orchestra, abounding in extra instruments in the ind choir. Yet with it, he attains no mighty sonorities, no luminous or shadowed depths, no progressions that are like the singer of the advancing sea. Time and again his multiphicity of instruments only thickens and deadens sound and makes the music seem more opaque and calculated than it really is. Treating the instruments in groups or individually, he tries, as it often seems, to exhaust their possibilities. He runs up and down their range at any and all paces; or he dwells insistently upon the high "positions" of his strings or the high registers o fhis winds; or he sets the double-basses to feats of agility and the horns to miracles of speed; smitten themselves, his drums smite the tonal bars with their blows; or his picolo squeaks or his xylophone rattles out of some cranny in the tonal structure.

Yet with all this intricacy and elaboration and calculation, the music is thick and exact with timbres rather than elastic and glowing with them. So, also, with its harmonic coloring. Mr. Clapp's harmonic resource is precise and inexhaustible. It begins in the common heritage of music, it absorbs the patrimony of Wagner and Bruchmer and d'Indy; it drops at least into the legacy of Schönberg's "Haronmic lehre." It is a miracle of scholarship, most imitative, but individually applied. Yet the whole coloring of the music seems neutral and monotonous and very rarely does a harmonic stroke tingle upon ear and imagination. And so much of the music was designed seemingly to be strokes—strokes of timbres, strokes of harmonies, strokes of contrast, transition and unexpected juxtaposition. Almost always outside of the statement of his themes, Mr. Clapp is curiously abrupt; fertile as he is in figuration, it sounds always uneasy; plentiful and sure as he is in modulation, it has an irritating precision. It is resource applied, not imagination kindled. He cannot, or he will not make his symphony flow in long and plastic lines. He lays it strand beside strand, cable-wise, and then by sheer scholarly and scientific ingenuity binds them together by yet finer strands subtly woven. It is tabulated music, as it were—the music of applied science, with no more imagination and [illegible]

From TIMES

HERALD. SATURDAY.

APRIL 11.

NEW SYMPHONY BY P. G. CLAPP PERFORMED

Has Some Fine Ideas—Lacks Flowing Lines—Has Restlessness That Racks Nerves.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Philip Greeley Clapp's Symphony in E minor (MS.), led by the composer, and Bizet's first suite from the incidental music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

Mr. Clapp, whose symphony was performed for the first time, has indisputable talent. One may applaud or deplore the use he has made of this talent; all will admit that he has not wrapped it in a napkin and buried it.

To some this symphony is wholly antipathetic. They honestly dislike it and are frank and strong in disapproval. There are others who are not so much disturbed by what he said as by "the nasty way he said it." There are a few, a very few, who, fearing lest a genius pass unrecognized, find everything in the music "wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful! and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping."

The composer demands an unusually large orchestra, two English horns, four clarinets and, if possible, five, besides a bass clarinet; eight horns (four interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas), and everything in like proportion. We miss, however, the celesta, the sarrusophone and the tonitruant. A formidable orchestra is collected. The question is whether by these extra instruments the composer gains additional effects, whether true sonority is increased, whether the orchestration is not all the thicker in consequence.

The symphony is without a program. Mr. Clapp also says it is free in form and the chief theme dominates the whole work. It is surprising to some that a composer of old New England stock should be so ultra-modern in his ideas, but New Englanders of staid families have shown the spirit of revolt before Mr. Clapp began to take lessons in harmony. No sane hearer today demands that a composition be in the strict form dear to the Leipsic school or that the harmonic progressions and contrapuntal work be such as old Richter would have applauded.

There are some fine ideas in this symphony. The chief theme has decided character, a certain defiant pride. There is an imposing pedal in the first movement. The opening measures of the Adagio portray a mood and have a serene and thoughtful beauty. Here and there in the symphony are little bits of detail that fix the attention.

The salient faults of the work are the absence of flowing lines and of logical continuity; a perpetual restlessness that soon rasps the nerves; a writing for instruments without favor shown to their characteristic qualities; a lack of true dynamic and also emotional contrasts. There is too often a lack of style, taste, imagination.

Mr. Clapp no doubt thinks, or if you please, feels and hears his music this way. He has no desire to startle. He is inexorably grim in sincerity that does not court immediate applause. He might say that his idiom requires study on the part of the hearer. The hearer might reply that he does not find any idiom; that ideas, excellent in themselves, are not broadly developed—I do not use "developed" in its strictly pedagogic sense; that after an inspiring thought there is undue attention paid to [illegible]ential or extraneous and insignificant detail. He might also say that mannerisms are not ideas. He might wish the trick of starting phrases in the high positions of instruments and then leaping downwards were not so often repeated; that there were not so many pompously inconsequential sudden blasts and thumps of brass and pulsatile instruments.

The music is seldom euphonious. This swollen orchestra is not homogeneous or plastic. However clear Mr. Clapp's thoughts may be to him, he does not communicate them clearly to the hearer. However beautiful or impressive or dramatic they may now seem to him, the hearer, well disposed toward the composer, at the end is disappointed, for neither the musical thought nor the expression is sustained or greatly varied, and, after all, as Mozart said, music must sound. Mr. Clapp's dissonances do not disturb us because they are dissonances; they vex us because they are seldom beautiful, seldom effective.

Nor is the structure of the work impressive by reason of sure foundation and clearness of plan. For instance, there is no reason why the first movement should end so abruptly. Even in an ultra-modern symphony a reasonable anticipation of a close is not a vulgar commonplace. The second movement has also its surprises. Surprise may be the chief element of wit; it should not be a chief feature of a symphonic movement; and in music surprises quickly become stale, flat and unprofitable.

Dr. Muck conducted Bizet's charming suite. This music abounds in ideas felicitously expressed by simple means. It is to be regretted that a clarinet was substituted for a saxophone in the Prel[illegible]e and the Minuetto, for the timbre of the saxophone gives a peculiarly plain-

---

MONITOR, BOSTON,

APRIL 11, 1914

Boston Composer Appears at Head of Dr. Muck's Men Interpreting His First Orchestral Work of Large Structure

BIZET SUITE REVIVED

Producing from manuscript Philip Greeley Clapp's symphony No. 1 in E minor, with the composer conducting, the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its twenty-first public rehearsal on Friday afternoon to much applause. There was but one other number on the program, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1, which Dr. Muck conducted.

The chief points of excellence and of weakness in the new American symphony are easily noted by the most casual listener. They are those to be expected in the product of a country that is no more than half way on the road to a mastered expression of itself in music.

They are just the reverse of those to be expected of a nation that is only starting on the road to musical achievement. A people less advanced musically than Americans today, a people only beginning to see what the art of tone could do for it in stating its aspiration, would seize on interesting and appealing thoughts, but would be unable to develop them far. It would have some good things to say, but would have an imperfect way of saying them. It would be strong in idea and imperfect in technique. It would sing some songs of homely beauty. It would not, however, produce many compositions in abstruse form, or many that required an elaborate array of instruments to perform them. And what it did turn out would be graceless and ephemeral. On the one hand, it would make a perfect folk song, like "Swanee River." On the other hand, it would make some oratorios and symphonies that would be presented a few times and forgotten.

Such a people, conscious of its shortcomings, would soon look to the improvement of its technique. It would proceed to master form. It would compel tone resources into its possession. It would get hold of all the means of expression. In the process of getting them it might lose the knack of invention it had in the epoch of its first singing. It might exchange a little originality for a great deal of facility. And that seems to be about what the American people, if the Boston group of composers may be regarded as representing the American people, has done. The American composer, if Mr. Clapp can be taken to sum up national orchestral accomplishment, has at last learned his technique. He is no longer making an awkward struggle with symphonic and vocal forms. He can handle them as well as the Germans, Frenchmen and Italians to whom he has gone to school. In his E minor symphony Mr. Clapp is as much a master of the craft of scoring as Strauss, Debussy, Sibelius or any other composer of established acclaim. He is entitled to a chair in the assembly of the mastersingers. He is an orchestral mechanician of the first grade. He is doubtless, too, a master of formal design, even if he makes little application of his knowledge of it. He neglects symmetry, but probably from choice, not from lack of understanding of it. He may be accepted as an expert tonal architect, though one who works along no lines of defined style.

In other words, Mr. Clapp has all the means in the world with which to say interesting things, and yet he does not say them.

The fault is by no means his. For in a correct view it is not composers who bring music into existence. It is the people who listen. Where there is a desire for a picturing of the life of a country through symphonies, the symphonies come. Where there is a yearning for the expression of national sentiment through song, the songs come. Stephen Foster's plantation tunes have the merit of idea and originality because the American public of their epoch had ears for a message through the medium of the song form. Philip Greeley Clapp or some other composer in Boston or in some other city of the United States would write a symphony tomorrow possessing the merit of idea and of originality if the public of American listeners were desirous of hearing a declaration of their hopes and feelings in the symphonic form.

Dr. Muck, taking up the baton after Mr. Clapp, pleased the audience greatly with his interpretation of the four little pieces of Bizet's suite. He gave the music its rhythmical value in a remarkable way. If he did not enter deeply into its poetic melancholy he brought o[illegible] [illegible] brilliantly.

TRANSCRIPT, 1914

APRIL 11.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. CLAPP'S MUSIC OF APPLIED SCIENCE

The Paradoxical Contrast Between the Material of His New Symphony and His Treatment of It—Eloquent and Distinctive Themes from Which Only Dry, Calculated, Scholarly and Scientific Music Rises—Process Without Emotion or Expression — The Moral of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne"

As Mr. Clapp led the Symphony Orchestra through his new symphony yesterday afternoon, the man curiously suggested the music. With his right hand he beat the measure in unfailing clearness and unflagging precision. He might have been conducting for the thousandth instead of the twentieth time, so composed and exact was he and so firm was his grip upon himself, his men and his music. His face was changeless in its expression of cool and confident earnestness. His left hand and arm remained fixed at his side in a fashion that a Prussian sergeant might have envied. They never stirred to indicate advance or recession, climax or contrast, accent or shading. As it seemed the conductor-composer had thought out the whole "reading" of his symphony, enjoined it wisely upon the orchestra, left nothing to chance and next to nothing to the emotion of the transmitting moment. The symphony ran its course as clearly and certainly as the sun across a sky unclouded from dawn to dark. The applause of friendly regard or cool admiration rewarded Mr. Clapp at each pause and at the close of the whole symphony—applause that was a little awkward because of the abruptness of the endings. In as cool acknowledgment, the poised composer received it. Yet no doubt he had emotions within.

There is emotion of a sort in Mr. Clapp's symphony—cool, reasoned, confident emotion—that reveals itself chiefly where, in ultra-modern symphonies by young composers, the listener expects least to find it. Mood and feeling stir in them, for the most part, when they begin to manipulate their themes, to ripen them into melodies, to set them in conflict, to put them in march whither imagination and passion may lead them. Their themes in themselves are little more than material for these revealing, amplifying and glorifying processes. In contrast, Mr. Clapp's manipulation is materialistic; while in his themes themselves is individual quality and clear emotion. When he first states them, as at the beginning of the symphony with the theme that is to dominate it, or at the beginning of the slow movement with the theme from which it is to spring, they outstand from the background; arrest the ear and fix themselves clearly and firmly upon mind and imagination. Individuality is in them and inner voices in particular give them character. Emotion is in them, too, even though it is a thoughtful emotion of the mind rather than a spontaneous upspringing of the spirit. They are less sensuous than they are cerebral; yet to be such need not and does not deprive them of mood and feeling.

More than one, too, is of unusual amplitude, not merely a melodic fragment to be developed, but a melody clearly outlined and self-contained. The principal theme, as the introduction discloses it, as it runs its course through the symphony, is unmistakably eloquent. It has even its suggestion of power. The main theme of the slow movement is as unmistakably beautiful, with the contemplative beauty of introspective mood translating itself into instrumental song that would be lyrical were it a little less austere. Even the main theme of the scherzo, which is primarily serviceable, and the secondary themes of the first movement, some of which are like unto it, have individual character. Moreover, almost all these themes are not only expressive in themselves, but fertile of what the technicians call "subsidiaries" and "variants" rich in possibilities of development, ranging and imaginative voice. True, these themes are not spontaneous or inevitable; they are obviously born of long and may be a little calculating meditation. But they have individuality, eloquence, mood and feeling, and they are rich in possibilities. Such themes are rare in these days in a young composer's first symphony. In them is the distinction of Mr. Clapp's music.

The design and the accomplishment of the symphony are at curious variance with the themes from which it springs. In them, Mr. Clapp is direct and eloquent, imaginative, emotional and individual. On the other hand in the development and the interplay of his music, he is intricate and baffling, writing often, as it seems, rather for the eye that analyzes his processes from the engraved page rather than for the ear that hears, understands and feels from moment to moment in the concert-room. For his years Mr. Clapp is erudite in music; he has the analytical mind and the scholarly temperament. If the making of music is not an exact science he seems often, in spite of his just disdain of orthodox form and academic symmetries, to wish that it were so. From his themes, he proceeds to write his symphony as though he were fulfilling a long list of specifications, imagined for it in the secrecy of his own scholarship and resource. It is possible to write a symphony that shall be "programme-less" music but that shall sound from beginning to end like a cumulating drama in tones. It is possible to write a symphony that shall be eloquent revelation in tones of mood and passion, of stress and conflict, victory or defeat born in the composer's spirit and entering into the spirit of those that hear. It is possible yet again to write a symphony as innocent of a "programme" as though it were written in 1714 and yet make it the poignant voice of universal human passion and pain, longing and elation.

Mr. Clapp's symphony is admittedly "programmeless," as he had a right to make it. Yet it need not have lacked so completely as it seems to lack at a single hearing any large and perceptible imaginative and emotional design. To introduction and opening allegro succeed a scherzo and trio; then a slow movement; then a finale. The introduction is brooding of mood; the diversified allegro that follows is alternately turbulent and reflective, and abrupt in both; the scherzo is now boisterous, now songful, and again march-like; the slow movement is a succession of variations upon a theme that in itself does not lack mood or beauty; the finale recapitulates and fuses all thematic material that has gone before and swells it into a tamely "triumphant" close of scholarly and scientific musical accomplishment. Thanks to its songful theme, the slow movement does communicate mood and feeling. There are moments of beauty and emotion in it. In the other three movements the moods are too fitful and obscured, too much mental concepts—as the philosophers say—rather than emotion released, concentrated and distilled to impress themselves upon the hearer. As the embodiment and enactment of a drama in tones, as revelation of an individual spirit, as a proclamation of universal human emotion the design and the accomplishment of Mr. Clapp's symphony are null. Often it seems as detached from an emotional or imaginative experience as logarithms themselves.

On the other hand the symphony abounds in scholarly [illegible] design, resource and accomplishment. From beginning to end it seems planned to fulfill these imagined specifications and to the last letter it accomplishes them. Mr. Clapp is dryly adroit in the anticipation of the themes his listeners are soon to hear. He works out, with a scientific and engineering imagination, as it were, subsidiaries" and "variants" of them. They undergo thoughtful and intricate transformations at his hands; they pass from movement to movement, and so knit the symphony together and sustain it. He draws them out finer and finer, more and more numerously and elaborately, until when he finally reassembles them at the beginning of the finale the impression upon the ear is very like the impression upon the eye of the cables of a suspension bridge about to be bound into their fastenings. The rest of the movement is the binding, for the most part tight upon the theme of the slow movement. Now all this is an interesting process to observe in music-making as its analogue is in bridge-building. To accomplish it as resourcefully, surely and completely as Mr. Clapp has done is no light achievement for the music-maker. It even argues a kind of imagination and a sort of creative faculty in him. But it remains a scientific process more impressive on the engraved page than in the actual voice of the music. Now the distinctive attribute of music is to sound and to be apprehended through the ear by mind and imagination. Far too much for the good of his symphony Mr, Clapp seems to conceive music, not as an expressive art, but as an applied science.

The engraved page, moreover, unless the reader has a very "hearing" eye, hides many a shortcoming and idiosyncrasy that the actual sounding of the music unsparingly reveals. Mr. Clapp assembles a very large orchestra, abounding in extra instruments in the ind choir. Yet with it, he attains no mighty sonorities, no luminous or shadowed depths, no progressions that are like the singer of the advancing sea. Time and again his multiphicity of instruments only thickens and deadens sound and makes the music seem more opaque and calculated than it really is. Treating the instruments in groups or individually, he tries, as it often seems, to exhaust their possibilities. He runs up and down their range at any and all paces; or he dwells insistently upon the high "positions" of his strings or the high registers o fhis winds; or he sets the double-basses to feats of agility and the horns to miracles of speed; smitten themselves, his drums smite the tonal bars with their blows; or his picolo squeaks or his xylophone rattles out of some cranny in the tonal structure.

Yet with all this intricacy and elaboration and calculation, the music is thick and exact with timbres rather than elastic and glowing with them. So, also, with its harmonic coloring. Mr. Clapp's harmonic resource is precise and inexhaustible. It begins in the common heritage of music, it absorbs the patrimony of Wagner and Bruchmer and d'Indy; it drops at least into the legacy of Schönberg's "Haronmic lehre." It is a miracle of scholarship, most imitative, but individually applied. Yet the whole coloring of the music seems neutral and monotonous and very rarely does a harmonic stroke tingle upon ear and imagination. And so much of the music was designed seemingly to be strokes—strokes of timbres, strokes of harmonies, strokes of contrast, transition and unexpected juxtaposition. Almost always outside of the statement of his themes, Mr. Clapp is curiously abrupt; fertile as he is in figuration, it sounds always uneasy; plentiful and sure as he is in modulation, it has an irritating precision. It is resource applied, not imagination kindled. He cannot, or he will not make his symphony flow in long and plastic lines. He lays it strand beside strand, cable-wise, and then by sheer scholarly and scientific ingenuity binds them together by yet finer strands subtly woven. It is tabulated music, as it were—the music of applied science with[illegible] more ima[illegible]ation and [illegible] of crea[illegible] than such [illegible]

Yet for [illegible]

Though Mr. Clapp's symphony was only fifty minutes long, Dr. Muck believed it exacting enough upon both orchestra and audience to warrant only one more piece that made the concert the shortest of the year. He chose it contrastingly—the four fragments from the incidental music to the play, "The Woman of Arlis" that Bizet, after it failed, bound together in an orchestral suite, the prelude built upon its sturdy folk-tune, the groping and pitiful measures of the idiot boy and the flaming phrase of the youth's passion for the harlot ("Look and see whether men die of love"); the brightly rhythmed minuet; the murmorous and tender adagretto of the old people; and the glowing and chiming carillon of the fête. The melodies whence Bizet has imagined this music are simple and spontaneous yet altogether expressive of his purpose; he develops and enriches them as simply; they become both felicitous and poignant. The music is of a perfect and easy artistry that hides itself so that prelude and carillon, minuet and adagretto fall without verb or thought between upon ear and sensibility. They caress or stimulate the oric; they touch the other. Music could hardly be more transparent; more amplilily accomplish the ends of imagination and emotion or set in clearer light the beauties of tone and phrase and euphony and the power of rhythm of which the orchestra is capable. Maybe, it was an after-piece to Mr. Clapp's symphony. Possibly it was a moral to it. Dr. Muck has an ineradicable sense of irony.

H. T. P.

HERALD, SATURDAY.
APRIL 18, 1914.

LOEFFLER AND GOETZ WORKS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Former's "Death of Tintagiles" and Latter's Symphony in F Major Played.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Louise Homer was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in F major	Goetz
Air, "O Pardon Me"	Bach
Aria, "Divinities of Styx"	Gluck
"The Death of Tintagiles"	Loeffler
Aria, "O Don Patale"	Verdi
Overture to "Leonora" No. 1	Beethoven

Goetz's symphony had not been played here since Dr. Muck's first sojourn in December, 1907. The music is agreeable, often pretty; music that does not tax the understanding and gives immediate pleasure by its melodiousness and cheerful spirit. And it seemed yesterday appropriate to the day and its suggestions of spring. Extraordinary things have been written about this symphony in times past. A London critic no longer ago than 1893—was it not Mr. Bernard Shaw?—did not hesitate to say that it was the only real symphony composed after the death of Beethoven. Mendelssohn, Schubert and Schumann were put below Goetz as symphonic writers. "Brahms, who alone touches him in mere brute musical faculty, is a dolt in comparison to him." Mr. Weingartner, less exuberant, has written warmly in praise of the symphony, and revived it in German concert halls, from which it had almost disappeared.

The Intermezzo, as of old, was especially enjoyed. No doubt the admirable performance alone would have brought hearty applause, but the blitheness of the movement and the gentle sentiment of a trio which approaches dangerously the sentimentalism of a German part song for male singers, also made their way. The first two movements wear the best. In the third movement the hearer found himself thinking of Mr. George Moore's "Vale" which has just been published, wondering how the Athletics were faring in New York, and other matters, impersonal and personal, proper and improper. All that Dr. Muck and his men could do was done for this Adagio and the Finale, and the hearer was conscious of pleasant sounds that soothed and left no definite impression. But the first two movements even in 1914—the Symphony is nearly 50 years old—are still fresh and spontaneous; the workmanship is singularly graceful.

The Symphony bears a motto taken from a poem by Schiller. It might better bear as a motto this sentence of Athenaeus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentleman like joy."

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem had not been performed here for 10 years. This dramatically imaginative work should not thus have been neglected. We should like to hear again Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" for orchestra. He is probably not satisfied with it, for it is not published, and he is not in the habit of composing with one eye on a publisher, however friendly disposed the man may be. Mr. Loeffler rewrote "The Death of Tintagiles" after it had been produced and applauded. It will be remembered that at first there were two violes d' amour. He took out the second and lessened the importance of the first, so that the poem had a more marked orchestral character. Mr. Loeffler is a master of instrumentation; yet it may be asked whether if he were to compose this symphonic poem afresh, he would use the viol d' amour at all. No doubt he found its peculiar timbre well suited to the musical characterization of the child expressing his timidity, his tears his plaintive little voice. But the instrument, whether it be in the hands of Mr. Loeffler or of Mr. Ferir, who played it yesterday, is necessarily limited in expressive force. The strings will not bear too much pressing by reason of the addition of the sympathetic companions of wire.

On the other hand, Mr. Loeffler might say that he did not wish in this instance a large range of expression; that Tintagiles, a child, in terror of in tears, was monochromatic, not to say monotonous in voicing his emotions; that the viol d'amour is the one fitting instrument. Be that as it may, the poem is superbly tragic. The action is continuous, from the reminder of the wild night without the castle to the feeble cry of the child and then—the ghastly silence. There is no diminution in the interest; no extravagance in fancy; no eccentricity in orchestration; no experimenting in the hope of a possible effect; there is always passion, at no time hysteria. The hearer recognizes the inevitableness of this music after the title is known. The musical contents and the orchestration show a master in his art, a master who, with the Belgian poet, saw the agony of the Sister in the sombre castle, heard the moaning of Tintagiles, felt the malevolence of the stealthy, noisome Queen.

Mr. Loeffler, the conductor, and the orchestra were loudly applauded. Mme. Homer was warmly greeted. Only once have we heard the air from Gluck's "Alceste" sung with tragic intensity in the grand manner, and that was not in the opera as performed at Munich, not in concerts in this country. The singer was Gabriele Krauss, who, no longer young, and in Paris, sang with such breadth and dignity of style, such classic feeling, that the hearers then accepted Gluck as lord of noble passion. The selection of Bach's air was not wholly advantageous to the singer, for the beauty of the violin solo played by Mr. Witek distracted attention from the less noteworthy melodic expression of the singer. Mme. Homer showed a greater fervor in the familiar air of Verdi. She sang freely, and the voice was richly sonorous, although occasionally, as in Bach's music, the upper tones were lacking in resonance.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mozart's symphony in D major (K. 504); Reznicek's "Schlemihl" (first time); Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, No. 12.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.
APRIL 18,

MR LOEFFLER'S TONE POEM FINELY PLAYED

Music of Excellent Ideas Brilliantly Treated.

Mme Homer Affords Enjoyment by Beauty of Her Voice.

The performance of Mr Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," at the 22d Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, again called to mind the truth that one of the six, perhaps seven, greatest living composers of symphonic music makes his home in a suburb of this city and attends regularly the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Mr Loeffler does not invite or encourage sensational publicity. To the average concertgoer he may appear only a composer of music that is heard rather infrequently in the concert rooms because it is written chiefly in the large forms. It may be surprising to those who take Mr Loeffler's uncommon talents as a more or less commonplace matter to observe what the verdict of later years may be upon his work as a musical creator. His fine imagination, his grasp and sense of proportion in translating poetic images into musical formulas, his virility of mind and mastery of orchestral technic; above and beneath all, his instinctive and unfailing sense of the true artist—these are not common characteristics to be found combined in the native and acquired abilities of one who chooses to compose.

It is not necessary that Mr Loeffler's music should be heard according to a strict "program," after Maeterlinck's drama of the ghastly and tragic death of the boy Tintagiles, nor that there be photographic reproduction of the aged, zealous and wicked queen, who holds all about her body and soul in the thrall of darkness.

Those who would interpret this particular drama find it filled with symbolism. This music has the inherent character of universal drama—stern and terrible conflict, culminating in catastrophe or tragedy. Mr Loeffler's ideas first of all have outline, individuality, an emotional force which carries and convinces. They do not merely suggest, as a lame apology, even as a caricature unbidden, an effect for which the composer has impotently striven. Whether these measures are dissected for their melodic, harmonic or particularly their rhythmic structure, they show invention of a high order, invention moreover born of spontaneity and not of much mongering of phrases.

It is unfortunate that the viole d'amour, played with such admirable art by Mr Ferir, has become obsolete, even as much of the exquisitely sculptured music of its epoch in Italy. The tone of the instrument, probably because of the overtones of the inner strings vibrating through sympathy, is warmer, more caressing and brighter than its more sombre and veiled modern sister, the viola. How effectively the older instrument might intervene between the violins and viola in the string quartet, or even take the place of the second violin.

Goetz, who brought Katharine and Petruchio into opera, wrote a symphony in his F-major of honest and ingratiating music. Profound or searching emotionally it is not, but there is pleasing melody. Its structure, while obvious and rarely leading the hearers into sudden surprises, rewards him at least by being clear. The scherzo is dull and the slow movement prosaic, but the last is jubilant and the first might serve as a good model for any young composer between 20 and 30 who is not yet a genius or a great light.

Mme Louise Homer, not heard with the orchestra since the Fall of 1909, sang these arias: "O Pardon Me," from Bach's St Matthew Passion; Divinites du Styx, from Gluck's "Alceste," and "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The luscious quality of Mme Homer's voice is still unique among the voices of women. She sang Gluck's aria with becoming nobility and breadth of style. The Bach excerpt is out of place on such a program and Mme Homer was not sure of its difficult intonations. Mr Witek took the honors by his obbligato, played with a masterful sense of its school and style. Verdi's aria, an inflated and pompous relic of his early period, has high notes out of Mme Homer's range.

Beethoven's infrequently heard overture to Leonora, No. 1, closed the program, a work that has but little of the dramatic strength of the better known companion, No. 3. It remains but to express thanks for Dr Muck's superb reading of Mr Loeffler's tone poem, insistent with dramatic feeling and the virtuoso performance by the men. The composer was obliged to bow at least three times from his seat in the first balcony.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
APRIL 18, 1914.

This week's Symphony program is one of the most interesting of the season. Such programs have not been the rule of late.

Yesterday the audience was delighted to hear again the melodious symphony by Hermann Goetz, which was first performed in Boston in 1880, only a few years after the too early death of its talented young author. Dr. Muck first revived the sprightly work in the middle of the season of 1907-8.

Goetz's work has been enthusiastically praised by so discriminating a judge as Weingartner, who took pleasure in conducting the symphony himself, as did Nikisch. Few modern symphonies equal it in beauty and piquancy of theme and in richness of orchestration. It is a symphony with a soul. Goetz did not manufacture his music, as so many composers seem to do nowadays; he had a message to deliver, and he had the great old-timers' faith in the virtue of a tune. Here is a modern symphony that is not cryptic and utterly cerebral.

The audience yesterday applauded the performance until Dr. Muck, recalled for the third time, signaled the orchestra to stand up.

Another striking feature of the program is Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," which was suggested by Maeterlinck's little play of the same name. This, too, was stirringly played, and at the end there was an outburst of applause that did not cease until the composer had made his bow from the balcony, where he usually sits. Emile Ferir played the solo part written for the viole d'amour.

Mme. Louise Homer, the distinguished contralto, sang several solos and was heartily applauded for them. The concert, which will be repeated tonight, ended with a performance of Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture.

Next week's program will include a novelty, Reznicek's "Schlemihl." The other numbers will be the Mozart symphony in D major and the Haydn symphony in B-flat major.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 18, 1914

LOEFFLER INSPIRES SYMPHONY

Fantastical Music After Maeterlinck Given Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was not the excellent singing of Mme. Louise Homer, nor the admirable orchestral performance of Goetz' F major symphony, which Dr. Muck kindled into life again, but Mr. Charles Loeffler's wild and beautiful music, inspired by "The Death of Tintagiles," the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck.

Of this remarkable music Dr. Muck gave an inspired performance, a performance which must surely have gladdened [illegible] who certainly, on this occasion, came into his own. For the audience sat spellbound, so absorbed that at the end of the piece there was a pause of absolute silence before the applause commenced.

MARVEL OF POETIC BEAUTY

Mr. Loeffler composed this music some 15 years ago. After public performances he materially revised the score, and this was in accordance with his habits as a composer, for he is not one to dash a symphonic poem on paper and hurry it into the concert hall. A musician of exceptional requirements, he is severely self-critical. When he has launched a composition on its career, it is likely to be cast in a form which will endure and stand examination after more than one decade. It is possible that today Mr. Loeffler finds his earlier tone-poem a little more conventional, a little less distinctively his own, than later pieces, such as the "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra. Be that as it may, "La Mort de Tintagiles," symphonic poem after Maeterlinck, which puzzled even intelligent audiences when it was first performed, was yesterday a marvel of beauty and logic and coherence, a score endlessly suggestive and poetic in its development, and a score to which any one of the more advanced composers of today might well be proud to sign his name.

In this romantic and thrilling music there are occasionally hints of the style of Chabrier or Debussy, but the matter is one of the letter rather than the spirit. Occasionally, as it were, the composer uses a modern idiom, fashioned by another, because he finds the idiom most suitable for his purpose. His composition is fascinating, not only by reason of its mood, its rich harmony and wealth of instrumental color but also on account of the extreme simplicity and logic of the musical structure, made with the utmost economy of materials as the endless and ingenious transformations of a motive stated in the first pages testify. Yes: For Mr. Loeffler there is no need to beg off on accusations of formlessness committed in the name of the symphonic poem. Symphonically this poem is grounded as firm as a rock upon essential principles of symphonic treatment, and standing the most critical examination upon these as well as upon more poetic grounds.

How imaginative and dramatic is this music! There is the suggestion, first of all, of the wild night, and the course of the mysterious and fateful drama of Maeterlinck is followed in its essential phases in a manner possible only to the musician—so that it might be said that this symphonic poem completes in the medium of a complementary art the intention of the author. There is the sinister thought of retreating footsteps, "the steps as of many, who do not walk as other beings, yet draw near and whisper without the guarded door." And finally, there is the wonderful archaic voice of the solo viola d'amore (played with inimitable mastery by Mr. Ferir) lamenting in a strange and far-off manner over the tonal background supplied by the others instruments. This music seems to us the acme of tone-poetry. It is archaic and legendary; it is overwhelmingly dramatic; above and over all, it is transcendently beautiful and to attempt a further tribute to the composer is a vain thing, because words stop where music begins.

But another word should be said for Dr. Muck's performance, which for imaginative sweep and the most sensative realization of the composer's dream stands out among the greatest performances given by this orchestra in recent years, a performance which can never be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to be present. Mr. Loeffler, in the audience, was called several times to his feet.

Mme. Homer sang music eminently suited to her noble voice, and the dignity and repose of her style. Her first air was "Pardon Me" from Bach's St. Matthew Passion. She sang the air with full appreciation of its devout and tragic character, and also with exceptional and adequate appreciation of the splendid long line of the musical phrases, and Mr. Witek's violin solo placed the musican by the side of the singer.

Though Mr. Clapp's symphony was only fifty minutes long, Dr. Muck believed it exacting enough upon both orchestra and audience to warrant only one more piece that made the concert the shortest of the year. He chose it contrastingly—the four fragments from the incidental music to the play, "The Woman of Arlis" that Bizet, after it failed, bound together in an orchestral suite, the prelude built upon its sturdy folk-tune, the groping and pitiful measures of the idiot boy and the flaming phrase of the youth's passion for the harlot ("Look and see whether men die of love"); the brightly rhythmed minuet; the murmorous and tender adagretto of the old people; and the glowing and chiming carillon of the fête. The melodies whence Bizet has imagined this music are simple and spontaneous yet altogether expressive of his purpose; he develops and enriches them as simply; they become both felicitous and poignant. The music is of a perfect and easy artistry that hides itself so that prelude and carillon, minuet and adagretto fall without verb or thought between upon ear and sensibility. They caress or stimulate the oric; they touch the other. Music could hardly be more transparent; more amplilily accomplish the ends of imagination and emotion or set in clearer light the beauties of tone and phrase and euphony and the power of rhythm of which the orchestra is capable. Maybe, it was an after-piece to Mr. Clapp's symphony. Possibly it was a moral to it. Dr. Muck has an ineradicable sense of irony.

H. T. P.

HERALD, SATURDAY.
APRIL 18, 1914.

LOEFFLER AND GOETZ WORKS AT SYMPHONY HALL

Former's "Death of Tintagiles" and Latter's Symphony in F Major Played.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Louise Homer was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in F major................Goetz
Air, "O Pardon Me"..................Bach
Aria, "Divinities of Styx"............Gluck
"The Death of Tintagiles"..........Loeffler
Aria, "O Don Patale"................Verdi
Overture to "Leonora" No. 1....Beethoven

Goetz's symphony had not been played here since Dr. Muck's first sojourn in December, 1907. The music is agreeable, often pretty; music that does not tax the understanding and gives immediate pleasure by its melodiousness and cheerful spirit. And it seemed yesterday appropriate to the day and its suggestions of spring. Extraordinary things have been written about this symphony in times past. A London critic no longer ago than 1893—was it not Mr. Bernard Shaw?—did not hesitate to say that it was the only real symphony composed after the death of Beethoven. Mendelssohn, Schubert and Schumann were put below Goetz as symphonic writers. "Brahms, who alone touches him in mere brute musical faculty, is a dolt in comparison to him." Mr. Weingartner, less exuberant, has written warmly in praise of the symphony, and revived it in German concert halls, from which it had almost disappeared.

The Intermezzo, as of old, was especially enjoyed. No doubt the admirable performance alone would have brought hearty applause, but the blitheness of the movement and the gentle sentiment of a trio which approaches dangerously the sentimentalism of a German part song for male singers, also made their way. The first two movements wear the best. In the third movement the hearer found himself thinking of Mr. George Moore's "Vale" which has just been published, wondering how the Athletics were faring in New York, and other matters, impersonal and personal, proper and improper. All that Dr. Muck and his men could do was done for this Adagio and the Finale, and the hearer was conscious of pleasant sounds that soothed and left no definite impression. But the first two movements even in 1914—the Symphony is nearly 50 years old—are still fresh and spontaneous; the workmanship is singularly graceful.

The Symphony bears a motto taken from a poem by Schiller. It might better bear as a motto this sentence of Athenaeus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentleman like joy."

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem had not been performed here for 10 years. This dramatically imaginative work should not thus have been neglected. We should like to hear again Mr. Loeffler's "Bonne Chanson" for orchestra. He is probably not satisfied with it, for it is not published, and he is not in the habit of composing with one eye on a publisher, however friendly disposed the man may be. Mr. Loeffler rewrote "The Death of Tintagiles" after it had been produced and applauded. It will be remembered that at first there were two violes d' amour. He took out the second and lessened the importance of the first, so that the poem had a more marked orchestral character. Mr. Loeffler is a master of instrumentation; yet it may be asked whether if he were to compose this symphonic poem afresh, he would use the viol d' amour at all. No doubt he found its peculiar timbre well suited to the musical characterization of the child expressing his timidity, his tears, his plaintive little voice. But the instrument, whether it be in the hands of Mr. Loeffler or of Mr. Ferir, who played it yesterday, is necessarily limited in expressive force. The strings will not bear too much pressing by reason of the addition of the sympathetic companions of wire.

On the other hand, Mr. Loeffler might say that he did not wish in this instance a large range of expression; that Tintagiles, a child, in terror of in tears, was monochromatic, not to say monotonous in voicing his emotions; that the viol d'amour is the one fitting instrument. Be that as it may, the poem is superbly tragic. The action is continuous, from the reminder of the wild night without the castle to the feeble cry of the child and then—the ghastly silence. There is no diminution in the interest; no extravagance in fancy; no eccentricity in orchestration; no experimenting in the hope of a possible effect; there is always passion, at no time hysteria. The hearer recognizes the inevitableness of this music after the title is known. The musical contents and the orchestration show a master in his art, a master who, with the Belgian poet, saw the agony of the Sister in the sombre castle, heard the moaning of Tintagiles, felt the malevolence of the stealthy, noisome Queen.

Mr. Loeffler, the conductor, and the orchestra were loudly applauded. Mme. Homer was warmly greeted. Only once have we heard the air from Gluck's "Alceste" sung with tragic intensity in the grand manner, and that was not in the opera as performed at Munich, not in concerts in this country. The singer was Gabriele Krauss, who, no longer young, and in Paris, sang with such breadth and dignity of style, such classic feeling, that the hearers then accepted Gluck as lord of noble passion. The selection of Bach's air was not wholly advantageous to the singer, for the beauty of the violin solo played by Mr. Witek distracted attention from the less noteworthy melodic expression of the singer. Mme. Homer showed a greater fervor in the familiar air of Verdi. She sang freely, and the voice was richly sonorous, although occasionally, as in Bach's music, the upper tones were lacking in resonance.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mozart's symphony in D major (K. 504); Reznicek's "Schlemihl" (first time); Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, No. 12.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.
APRIL 18,

MR LOEFFLER'S TONE POEM FINELY PLAYED

Music of Excellent Ideas Brilliantly Treated.

Mme Homer Affords Enjoyment by Beauty of Her Voice.

The performance of Mr Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," at the 22d Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon, again called to mind the truth that one of the six, perhaps seven, greatest living composers of symphonic music makes his home in a suburb of this city and attends regularly the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Mr Loeffler does not invite or encourage sensational publicity. To the average concertgoer he may appear only a composer of music that is heard rather infrequently in the concert rooms because it is written chiefly in the large forms. It may be surprising to those who take Mr Loeffler's uncommon talents as a more or less commonplace matter to observe what the verdict of later years may be upon his work as a musical creator. His fine imagination, his grasp and sense of proportion in translating poetic images into musical formulas, his virility of mind and mastery of orchestral technic; above and beneath all, his instinctive and unfailing sense of the true artist—these are not common characteristics to be found combined in the native and acquired abilities of one who chooses to compose.

It is not necessary that Mr Loeffler's music should be heard according to a strict "program," after Maeterlinck's drama of the ghastly and tragic death of the boy Tintagiles, nor that there be photographic reproduction of the aged, zealous and wicked queen, who holds all about her body and soul in the thrall of darkness.

Those who would interpret this particular drama find it filled with symbolism. This music has the inherent character of universal drama—stern and terrible conflict, culminating in catastrophe or tragedy. Mr Loeffler's ideas first of all have outline, individuality, an emotional force which carries and convinces. They do not merely suggest, as a lame apology, even as a caricature unbidden, an effect for which the composer has impotently striven. Whether these measures are dissected for their melodic, harmonic or particularly their rhythmic structure, they show invention of a high order, invention moreover born of spontaneity and not of much mongering of phrases.

It is unfortunate that the viole d'amour, played with such admirable art by Mr Ferir, has become obsolete, even as much of the exquisitely sculptured music of its epoch in Italy. The tone of the instrument, probably because of the overtones of the inner strings vibrating through sympathy, is warmer, more caressing and brighter than its more sombre and veiled modern sister, the viola. How effectively the older instrument might intervene between the violins and viola in the string quartet, or even take the place of the second violin.

Goetz, who brought Katharine and Petruchio into opera, wrote a symphony in his F-major of honest and ingratiating music. Profound or searching emotionally it is not, but there is pleasing melody. Its structure, while obvious and rarely leading the hearers into sudden surprises, rewards him at least by being clear. The scherzo is dull and the slow movement prosaic, but the last is jubilant and the first might serve as a good model for any young composer between 20 and 30 who is not yet a genius or a great light.

Mme Louise Homer, not heard with the orchestra since the Fall of 1909, sang these arias: "O Pardon Me," from Bach's St Matthew Passion; Divinites du Styx, from Gluck's "Alceste," and "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The luscious quality of Mme Homer's voice is still unique among the voices of women. She sang Gluck's aria with becoming nobility and breadth of style. The Bach excerpt is out of place on such a program and Mme Homer was not sure of its difficult intonations. Mr Witek took the honors by his obbligato, played with a masterful sense of its school and style. Verdi's aria, an inflated and pompous relic of his early period, has high notes out of Mme Homer's range.

Beethoven's infrequently heard overture to Leonora, No. 1, closed the program, a work that has but little of the dramatic strength of the better known companion, No. 3. It remains but to express thanks for Dr Muck's superb reading of Mr Loeffler's tone poem, insistent with dramatic feeling and the virtuoso performance by the men. The composer was obliged to bow at least three times from his seat in the first balcony.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
APRIL 18, 1914.

This week's Symphony program is one of the most interesting of the season. Such programs have not been the rule of late.

Yesterday the audience was delighted to hear again the melodious symphony by Hermann Goetz, which was first performed in Boston in 1880, only a few years after the too early death of its talented young author. Dr. Muck first revived the sprightly work in the middle of the season of 1907-8.

Goetz's work has been enthusiastically praised by so discriminating a judge as Weingartner, who took pleasure in conducting the symphony himself, as did Nikisch. Few modern symphonies equal it in beauty and piquancy of theme and in richness of orchestration. It is a symphony with a soul. Goetz did not manufacture his music, as so many composers seem to do nowadays; he had a message to deliver, and he had the great old-timers' faith in the virtue of a tune. Here is a modern symphony that is not crypic and utterly cerebral.

The audience yesterday applauded the performance until Dr. Muck, recalled for the third time, signaled the orchestra to stand up.

Another striking feature of the program is Charles Martin Loeffler's tone poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," which was suggested by Maeterlinck's little play of the same name. This, too, was stirringly played, and at the end there was an outburst of applause that did not cease until the composer had made his bow from the balcony, where he usually sits. Emile Ferir played the solo part written for the viole d'amour.

Mme. Louise Homer, the distinguished contralto, sang several solos and was heartily applauded for them. The concert, which will be repeated tonight, ended with a performance of Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture.

Next week's program will include a novelty, Reznicek's "Schlemihl." The other numbers will be the Mozart symphony in D major and the Haydn symphony in B-flat major.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 18, 1914

LOEFFLER INSPIRES SYMPHONY

Fantastical Music After Maeterlinck Given Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was not the excellent singing of Mme. Louise Homer, nor the admirable orchestral performance of Goetz' F major symphony, which Dr. Muck kindled into life again, but Mr. Charles Loeffler's wild and beautiful music, inspired by "The Death of Tintagiles," the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck.

Of this remarkable music Dr. Muck gave an inspired performance, a performance which must surely have gladdened the heart of the composer, who certainly, on this occasion, came into his own. For the audience sat spellbound, so absorbed that at the end of the piece there was a pause of absolute silence before the applause commenced.

MARVEL OF POETIC BEAUTY

Mr. Loeffler composed this music some 15 years ago. After public performances he materially revised the score, and this was in accordance with his habits as a composer, for he is not one to dash a symphonic poem on paper and hurry it into the concert hall. A musician of exceptional requirements, he is severely self-critical. When he has launched a composition on its career, it is likely to be cast in a form which will endure and stand examination after more than one decade. It is possible that today Mr. Loeffler finds his earlier tone-poem a little more conventional, a little less distinctively his own, than later pieces, such as the "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra. Be that as it may, "La Mort de Tintagiles," symphonic poem after Maeterlinck, which puzzled even intelligent audiences when it was first performed, was yesterday a marvel of beauty and logic and coherence, a score endlessly suggestive and poetic in its development, and a score to which any one of the more advanced composers of today might well be proud to sign his name.

In this romantic and thrilling music there are occasionally hints of the style of Chabrier or Debussy, but the matter is one of the letter rather than the spirit. Occasionally, as it were, the composer uses a modern idiom, fashioned by another, because he finds the idiom most suitable for his purpose. His composition is fascinating, not only by reason of its mood, its rich harmony and wealth of instrumental color but also on account of the extreme simplicity and logic of the musical structure, made with the utmost economy of materials as the endless and ingenious transformations of a motive stated in the first pages testify. Yes: For Mr. Loeffler there is no need to beg off on accusations of formlessness committed in the name of the symphonic poem. Symphonically this poem is grounded as firm as a rock upon essential principles of symphonic treatment, and standing the most critical examination upon these as well as upon more poetic grounds.

How imaginative and dramatic is this music! There is the suggestion, first of all, of the wild night, and the course of the mysterious and fateful drama of Maeterlinck is followed in its essential phases in a manner possible only to the musician—so that it might be said that this symphonic poem completes in the medium of a complementary art the intention of the author. There is the sinister thought of retreating footsteps, "the steps as of many, who do not walk as other beings, yet draw near and whisper without the guarded door." And finally, there is the wonderful archaic voice of the solo viola d'amore (played with inimitable mastery by Mr. Ferir) lamenting in a strange and far-off manner over the tonal background supplied by the others instruments. This music seems to us the acme of tone-poetry. It is archaic and legendary; it is overwhelmingly dramatic; above and over all, it is transcendently beautiful and to attempt a further tribute to the composer is a vain thing, because words stop where music begins.

But another word should be said for Dr. Muck's performance, which for imaginative sweep and the most sensative realization of the composer's dream stands out among the greatest performances given by this orchestra in recent years, a performance which can never be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to be present. Mr. Loeffler, in the audience, was called several times to his feet.

Mme. Homer sang music eminently suited to her noble voice, and the dignity and repose of her style. Her first air was "Pardon Me" from Bach's St. Matthew Passion. She sang the air with full appreciation of its devout and tragic character, and also with exceptional and adequate appreciation of the splendid long line of the musical phrases, and Mr. Witek's violin solo placed the musican by the side of the singer.

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 18, 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF INTEREST

BRILLIANT PROGRAMME BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

Mme. Homer and Mr. Loeffler Share the Honors—Goetz's Symphony in F Also Played.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Goetz..........................Symphony in F major
Bach..................................."Oh Pardon Me"
Gluck................................"Divinites du Styx"
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.
Loeffler
"La Mort de Tintagiles." Symphonic Poem
Viol d'Amore, Mr. Emil Ferir.
Verdi........"O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos"
Mme. Homer.
Beethoven..................."Leonora No. 1," Overture

The concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon presented a well-assorte programme not too extreme in any of i numbers, since even Loeffler's romant and modern production is masterl tangible, and clear. Goetz's single symphony is seldom heard. It is somewhat c the school of Volkmann's symphonie concise, regular in form, melodic, an leaning towards the strict classic rather than the free modern style. It the irony of musical history that you comfortably situated modern compose with college education, pleasant soci position, and large clientele, writes th most bitter and ascetic music, while t poor struggler, such as Goetz, forced earn his daily bread even while almo helpless with consumption, will compo beautiful melody and generally attracti music.

Yet the modestly-scored and gentle symphony has lost some of its charm. Our viands have been so highly spiced that the simpler food becomes flavorless. That Goetz was very sincere in his music cannot be doubted, and that he found consolation in tones is shown by the motto which he attached to the symphony,—

> "Within thy bosom's silent chambers
> Seek refuge from the storms of Life."

This is but another form of the words (by Von Schober) which Schubert set to music, which ran thus:—

> "Thou Holy Art, how oft in sad grey hours,
> When Life's horizon seemed all dark to be,
> Hast thou upheld me with thy mighty powers
> And oped a purer, better world to me."

The sufferers seem to have found beauty and consolation in Music, while the prosperous moderns find chiefly new progressions, novel combinations of instruments and rhythmic cross-purposes in it.

The scoring is of the simplest, the regular classical forces, plus trombones. But Goetz handles these better than Schumann, and as well as Mendelssohn. There is a little departure from strict form in the first movement, since the subordinate theme and the closing theme are really spun out of the chief theme. The development which follows is masterly, always ingenious, never ugly. There is some affection displayed for the flute in this and in other parts of the symphony, and our excellent flautists deserve honorable mention. The horns and trumpets also were of excellent quality in their copious work.

The first movement is the least interesting of the symphony, in spite of its ingenuity. The second and third movements are veritable gems, containing enough beautiful musical ideas to set up a dozen modern music jugglers, and these were most spontaneously applauded. The dialogue between the horns and trumpets in the Intermezzo was nobly played, and the fluent harmonies of the Adagio were most pleasant to hear.

The Finale was a brilliant movement brilliantly played, but scarcely seemed such a masterpiece as the two movements which preceded it. The work was vociferously applauded and Dr. Muck recalled three times. It is pathetic to remember that the composer was denied the joy of hearing this work when it was given in Vienna, because he had not money enough to pay his railroad fare from Zurich.

It is always a delight to listen to Mme. Louise Homer, and we were glad to notice that, even at the end of an arduous season, the rich quality of her tones was unimpaired. Her numbers were in fine contrast with each other. The Bach air was expressive and pleading, the Gluck number broadly majestic, and the Verdi aria dramatic and sufficiently melodious to appeal to even the least educated auditor. Whether the last of these was quite in place in a symphonic concert may be questioned, but, since Mme. Homer's excellent singing gave such evident pleasure we need not be hyper-critical as to the fitness of the number. In "Oh Pardon Me!" the violin obbligato by Mr. Witek was very effective and the ensemble was excellent.

"Divinites du Styx" does not refer to female golf-champions but is one of Gluck's grandest airs, and its breadth was fairly thrilling.

Of course, however, the Italian operatic selection, less deep, less noble, but more directly melodic, aroused the chief enthusiasm of the concert. Even without being led by the applause of the multitude, we can heartily praise the way in which it was sung. Mme. Homer was certainly in her best vein in this concert.

But every number gave pleasure yesterday and we have seldom heard a symphony concert where the applausive evidence of public appreciation was so continuous.

We are not in sympathy with all of Mr. Loeffler's music and we are against the morbidness of Maeterlinck, but we find much that is beautiful and a great deal that is graphic in the Death of Tintagiles, even if like Tristan and Charles II. he is a long time in dying. The interest is sus- hearing the unusual instrument, the Viol D'Amore. This is an instrument like a viola, but with 14 strings, seven of which are under the finger-board and are not played on at all, merely resounding sympathetically to the notes played on the seven strings above the finger-board. The result is a very tender and expressive tone. The harmonics on this instrument are ineffably sweet. Why has it gone out of use? Because it is very difficult to play and requires much tuning. They used to say of the lute-player, that if he lived to be 80 he had probably spent 60 years tuning his instrument, and much the same might be told of the artist upon the Viol d'Amore. But Mr. Ferir played the difficult instrument with much charm and conquered the trying passages easily. No instrument could so fittingly picture Tintagiles as this one, and Mr. Loeffler showed his artistic sense in choosing it.

In fact the composer's orchestral skill is evident in every part of this work. Mr. Loeffler is certainly one of the world's great masters of tone-coloring. He was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times from his seat in the gallery, to very long-continued applause.

Beethoven's "Leonora No. 1" is not as good as No. 2, or No. 3, but it is just as well to keep it from growing dusty upon the shelf. It is about of the rank of the "Dedication of the House," or of the "Fidelio" overture, which would not be often heard if "Beethoven" had not been the composer's name. However it is just as well not to let the rising generation forget it and its good performance made a dignified end to a concert that had many more pleasing features than some that we

---

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date APR 12 19
Established:

THERE will be a revival of music in the coming week, and in the last of the Symphony Concerts, a list of several notable programmes will be inaugurated, lasting well into May. Of these there will be a sufficient variety t attract considerable attention for so lat a season, including in instrumental work beside the Boston Symphony Concer those of the Providence Symphony Orchestra next week and the Strube Ensemble, later.

A concert by Clara Butt and Kenner Rumford, the English singers, under t managament of Dr. Jordan, will affo another opportunity to hear these not vocalists, and the last concert i Steinert series next week will offer b instrumental and vocal attractions Longy Wind Choir, and Miss Lucy Mar soprano.

Then there will be the ever popular glee club concerts, Harvard with its glee and musical clubs coming to the front on April 29, and on May 1 our own University Glee Club will give its second concert of the season.

From a musical point of view the winter has offered a wide range of entertainment, and in spite of the discontinuance of some activities which had done much for the musical life of the city, there can be no cause to complain that it has been a dull season.

* * *

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, when the programme will be given in the following order: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Julius Caesar," Handel; "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from "Louise," Charpentier; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

The soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, who has made long progress in the last few years in the favor of the public of this country, until she has come to be recognized as one of the foremost sopranos among concert singers of today. She has already created an agreeable impression on previous appearances in this city, and in Tuesday's programme will sing twice, her first number being the recitative, "E pur cosi," and air, "Piangero la sorte mia," from Handel's opera, "Julius Caesar," and her second number, the famous air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise."

Mozart's symphony in E-flat is one of the three great masterpieces written by him in 1788, which alone would have been sufficient to have brought immortality to their composer had he written nothing else. The symphony in E-flat was dated June 26, that in G-minor on July 25 and the "Jupiter" symphony in C-major on Aug. 10.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" is in five movements which, however, are to be played without pause. This extraordinary Russian has taken typical Spanish dance tunes and treated them with remarkable skill, and althoug he is a Russian has kept the Spanis flavor to a marked degree. The work wa dedicated to the artists of the orchestr of the Imperial Russian Opera House i St. Petersburg, and as such is decidedly virtuoso piece, displaying at their bes all the various soloists of an orchestra.

Liszt's "Symphonie Poem," which familiar to most audiences, is the bes unquesionably, of those he wrote, and i its influence on the music that followe is one of the most important works o its period.

* * *

Now that the Boston Symphony seaso is about to come to an end, a backwa glance shows much of especial intere in the programmes that have been presented in Providence. Two soprano Mme. Gadski and Miss Hinkle; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler, and three pianist Ruth Deyo, Mme. Theresa Carreno a Paderewski, have been the soloists, a in the programmes which have foun general favor the symphonies have be Beethoven's Seventh, Franck's in minor, Glazounoff's in B-flat major, Mozart's in E-flat, Schubert's "Unfinishe and Tschaikowsky's Fourth.

The other composers represented Bizet, Brahms, Charpentier, Dvor Grieg, Handel, Lalo, Liszt, Mozart, Paderewski, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Smeta Wagner and Weber. It would proba be difficult to find a list more inclus of the great masters of music or a of works more inclusive of the gr masterpieces of music in a series of programmes.

* * *

The third concert

Miss Florence Hinkle
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra
This Week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in
From COURANT
Address HARTFORD, CONN.
Date APR 8 1914
Est
84

NO SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Audience Considers Dr. Muck's Musicians Sufficient.

SPLENDID CONCERT MUCH ENJOYED

Program for Final Appearance of Season Was Varied.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never played better in Hartford than it did last evening; that seemed to be the general opinion of the music-lovers making up the very large audience that filled the Parsons Theater and applauded every number to the echo. Dr. Muck and his men were in particularly fine form, and the brilliant program offered was very brilliantly played. There was no soloist—but a soloist was highly unnecessary; the orchestra was enough.

Tschaikowsky's wonderfully gladsome, brilliant and effective Symphony No. 4 was given a magnificent rendition. The whole performance was so finely rounded, so satisfying, so filled with the spirit of the joy of living that to pick out any certain parts of the work for commendation seems almost trivial—but not to mention the delight of the wood-wind tones in the valse measures of the andante; the splendid sonorous strings in their song in the second movement; the brilliant, strange and captivating scherzo in the principal part of which not a bow touched a string—lightning pizzicato playing being the rule; and the wonderful tones in the finale; not to speak of all these would be a great pity indeed.

Each movement of the symphony was rapturously applauded and when Dr. Muck was called back to the stage for the second time after the symphony was over he, in turn, called on his players to rise and share the applause with him.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes brings the charming music of Spain before the audience in many moods. Most melodic is the whole work, and in all the melodies there runs the strain of plaintiveness that seems to characteristic of Spanish music. The serenade and the gypsy song were odd and charming, the fandango strange and brilliant. The playing was full of fire and the seeming spontaneity that means, in an orchestra, only long and arduous work.

Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite from its first big unison melody to the last of the rustic measures that come in the "Carillon" was delightful. The "Minuetto" was particularly charming and the melodies of the succeeding movement were brilliantly played. And last of all came the Liszt "Preludes"—not the Wagner numbers that many of the orchestra's admirers had rather hoped for in this concert but a bril-

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 18, 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF INTEREST

BRILLIANT PROGRAMME BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

Mme. Homer and Mr. Loeffler Share the Honors—Goetz's Symphony in F Also Played.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Goetz.........................Symphony in F major
Bach...............................“Oh Pardon Me”
Gluck...............................“Divinites du Styx”
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.
Loeffler
“La Mort de Tintagiles.” Symphonic Poem
Viol d'Amore, Mr. Emil Ferir.
Verdi.........“O Don Fatale” from “Don Carlos”
Mme. Homer.
Beethoven.................“Leonora No. 1,” Overture

The concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon presented a well-assorted programme not too extreme in any of its numbers, since even Loeffler's romantic and modern production is masterly, tangible, and clear. Goetz's single symphony is seldom heard. It is somewhat of the school of Volkmann's symphonies, concise, regular in form, melodic, and leaning towards the strict classical rather than the free modern style. It is the irony of musical history that your comfortably situated modern composer, with college education, pleasant social position, and large clientele, writes the most bitter and ascetic music, while the poor struggler, such as Goetz, forced to earn his daily bread even while almost helpless with consumption, will compose beautiful melody and generally attractive music.

Yet the modestly-scored and gentle symphony has lost some of its charm. Our viands have been so highly spiced that the simpler food becomes flavorless. That Goetz was very sincere in his music cannot be doubted, and that he found consolation in tones is shown by the motto which he attached to the symphony,—

> “Within thy bosom's silent chambers
> Seek refuge from the storms of Life.”

This is but another form of the words (by Von Schober) which Schubert set to music, which ran thus:—

> “Thou Holy Art, how oft in sad grey hours,
> When Life's horizon seemed all dark to be,
> Hast thou upheld me with thy mighty powers
> And oped a purer, better world to me.”

The sufferers seem to have found beauty and consolation in Music, while the prosperous moderns find chiefly new progressions, novel combinations of instruments and rhythmic cross-purposes in it.

The scoring is of the simplest, the regular classical forces, plus trombones. But Goetz handles these better than Schumann, and as well as Mendelssohn. There is a little departure from strict form in the first movement, since the subordinate theme and the closing theme are really spun out of the chief theme. The development which follows is masterly, always ingenious, never ugly. There is some affection displayed for the flute in this and in other parts of the symphony, and our excellent flautists deserve honorable mention. The horns and trumpets also were of excellent quality in their copious work.

The first movement is the least interesting of the symphony, in spite of its ingenuity. The second and third movements are veritable gems, containing enough beautiful musical ideas to set up a dozen modern music jugglers, and these were most spontaneously applauded. The dialogue between the horns and trumpets in the Intermezzo was nobly played, and the fluent harmonies of the Adagio were most pleasant to hear.

The Finale was a brilliant [illegible] brilliantly played, but scarcely seemed such a masterpiece as the two movements which preceded it. The work was vociferously applauded and Dr. Muck recalled three times. It is pathetic to remember that the composer was denied the joy of hearing this work when it was given in Vienna, because he had not money enough to pay his railroad fare from Zurich.

It is always a delight to listen to Mme. Louise Homer, and we were glad to notice that, even at the end of an arduous season, the rich quality of her tones was unimpaired. Her numbers were in fine contrast with each other. The Bach air was expressive and pleading, the Gluck number broadly majestic, and the Verdi aria dramatic and sufficiently melodious to appeal to even the least educated auditor. Whether the last of these was quite in place in a symphonic concert may be questioned, but, since Mme. Homer's excellent singing gave such evident pleasure we need not be hyper-critical as to the fitness of the number. In “Oh Pardon Me!” the violin obbligato by Mr. Witek was very effective and the ensemble was excellent.

“Divinites du Styx” does not refer to female golf-champions but is one of Gluck's grandest airs, and its breadth was fairly thrilling.

Of course, however, the Italian operatic selection, less deep, less noble, but more directly melodic, aroused the chief enthusiasm of the concert. Even without being led by the applause of the multitude, we can heartily praise the way in which it was sung. Mme. Homer was certainly in her best vein in this concert.

But every number gave pleasure yesterday and we have seldom heard a symphony concert where the applausive evidence of public appreciation was so continuous.

We are not in sympathy with all of Mr. Loeffler's music and we are against the morbidness of Maeterlinck, but we find much that is beautiful and a great deal that is graphic in the Death of Tintagiles, even if like Tristan and Charles II. he is a long time in dying. The interest is sus- [illegible] hearing the unusual instrument, the Viol D'Amore. This is an instrument like a viola, but with 14 strings, seven of which are under the finger-board and are not played on at all, merely resounding sympathetically to the notes played on the seven strings above the finger-board. The result is a very tender and expressive tone. The harmonics on this instrument are ineffably sweet. Why has it gone out of use? Because it is very difficult to play and requires much tuning. They used to say of the lute-player, that if he lived to be 80 he had probably spent 60 years tuning his instrument, and much the same might be told of the artist upon the Viol d'Amore. But Mr. Ferir played the difficult instrument with much charm and conquered the trying passages easily. No instrument could so fittingly picture Tintagiles as this one, and Mr. Loeffler showed his artistic sense in choosing it.

In fact the composer's orchestral skill is evident in every part of this work. Mr. Loeffler is certainly one of the world's great masters of tone-coloring. He was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times from his seat in the gallery, to very long-continued applause.

Beethoven's “Leonora No. 1” is not as good as No. 2, or No. 3, but it is just as well to keep it from growing dusty upon the shelf. It is about of the rank of the “Dedication of the House,” or of the “Fidelio” overture, which would not be often heard if “Beethoven” had not been the composer's name. However it is just as well not to let the rising generation forget it and its good performance made a dignified end to a concert that had many more pleasing features than some that we can recall.

Miss Florence Hinkle
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra
This Week.

RNAL
Providence, R. I.
APR 12 19

THERE will be a revival of music in the coming week, and in the last of the Symphony Concerts, a list of several notable programmes will be inaugurated, lasting well into May. Of these there will be a sufficient variety to attract considerable attention for so late a season, including in instrumental work, beside the Boston Symphony Concert, those of the Providence Symphony Orchestra next week and the Strube Ensemble, later.

A concert by Clara Butt and Kennerly Rumford, the English singers, under the managament of Dr. Jordan, will afford another opportunity to hear these noted vocalists, and the last concert in the Steinert series next week will offer both instrumental and vocal attractions in the Longy Wind Choir, and Miss Lucy Marsh, soprano.

Then there will be the ever popular glee club concerts, Harvard with its glee and musical clubs coming to the front on April 29, and on May 1 our own University Glee Club will give its second concert of the season.

From a musical point of view the winter has offered a wide range of entertainment, and in spite of the discontinuance of some activities which had done much for the musical life of the city, there can be no cause to complain that it has been a dull season.

* * *

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, when the programme will be given in the following order: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from “Julius Caesar,” Handel; “Caprice on Spanish Themes,” Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from “Louise,” Charpentier; symphonic poem, “Les Preludes,” Liszt.

The soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, who has made long progress in the last few years in the favor of the public of this country, until she has come to be recognized as one of the foremost sopranos among concert singers of today. She has already created an agreeable impression on previous appearances in this city, and in Tuesday's programme will sing twice, her first number being the recitative, “E pur cosi,” and air, “Piangero la sorte mia,” from Handel's opera, “Julius Caesar,” and her second number, the famous air, “Depuis le jour,” from Charpentier's opera, “Louise.”

Mozart's symphony in E-flat is one of the three great masterpieces written by him in 1788, which alone would have been sufficient to have brought immortality to their composer had he written nothing else. The symphony in E-flat was dated June 26, that in G-minor on July 25 and the “Jupiter” symphony in C-major on Aug. 10.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's “Caprice on Spanish Themes” is in five movements which, however, are to be played without pause. This extraordinary Russian has taken typical Spanish dance tunes and treated them with remarkable skill, and although he is a Russian has kept the Spanish flavor to a marked degree. The work was dedicated to the artists of the orchestra of the Imperial Russian Opera House in St. Petersburg, and as such is decidedly a virtuoso piece, displaying at their best all the various soloists of an orchestra.

Liszt's “Symphonie Poem,” which is familiar to most audiences, is the best, unquesionably, of those he wrote, and in its influence on the music that followed is one of the most important works of its period.

* * *

Now that the Boston Symphony season is about to come to an end, a backward glance shows much of especial interest in the programmes that have been presented in Providence. Two sopranos, Mme. Gadski and Miss Hinkle; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler, and three pianists, Ruth Deyo, Mme. Theresa Carreno and Paderewski, have been the soloists, and in the programmes which have found general favor the symphonies have been Beethoven's Seventh, Franck's in D-minor, Glazounoff's in B-flat major, Mozart's in E-flat, Schubert's “Unfinished” and Tschaikowsky's Fourth.

The other composers represented are Bizet, Brahms, Charpentier, Dvorak, Grieg, Handel, Lalo, Liszt, Mozart, Paderewski, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Smetana, Wagner and Weber. It would probably be difficult to find a list more inclusive of the great masters of music or a list of works more inclusive of the great masterpieces of music in a series of six programmes.

* * *

The third concert [illegible]

---

aper Cutting Bureau in COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
APR 8 1914

SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Audience Considers Dr. Muck's Musicians Sufficient.

SPLENDID CONCERT MUCH ENJOYED

Program for Final Appearance of Season Was Varied.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never played better in Hartford than it did last evening; that seemed to be the general opinion of the music-lovers making up the very large audience that filled the Parsons Theater and applauded every number to the echo. Dr. Muck and his men were in particularly fine form, and the brilliant program offered was very brilliantly played. There was no soloist—but a soloist was highly unnecessary; the orchestra was enough.

Tschaikowsky's wonderfully gladsome, brilliant and effective Symphony No. 4 was given a magnificent rendition. The whole performance was so finely rounded, so satisfying, so filled with the spirit of the joy of living that to pick out any certain parts of the work for commendation seems almost trivial—but not to mention the ght of the wood-wind tones in the e measures of the andante; the endid sonorous strings in their song e second movement; the brilliant, nge and captivating scherzo in the incipal part of which not a bow uched a string—lightning pizzicato ying being the rule; and the won- rful tones in the finale; not to speak all these would be a great pity in- ed.

Each movement of the symphony as rapturously applauded and when r. Muck was called back to the stage r the second time after the sym- ony was over he, in turn, called on s players to rise and share the ap- use with him.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on anish Themes brings the charming c of Spain before the audience in moods. Most melodic is the e work, and in all the melodies runs the strain of plaintiveness seems to characteristic of Span- usic. The serenade and the gyp- g were odd and charming, the go strange and brilliant. The was full of fire and the seem- ntaneity that means, in an or- only long and arduous work. s “L'Arlesienne” Suite from its unison melody to the last of ic measures that come in the n” was delightful. The “Min- vas particularly charming and odies of the succeeding move- re brilliantly played. And came the Liszt “Preludes”— Wagner numbers that many orchestra's admirers had rather for in this concert but a bril- [illegible]

[159]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 18, 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT FULL OF INTEREST

BRILLIANT PROGRAMME BRILLIANTLY GIVEN

Mme. Homer and Mr. Loeffler Share the Honors—Goetz's Symphony in F Also Played.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Goetz........................Symphony in F major
Bach..............................."Oh Pardon Me"
Gluck.........................."Divinites du Styx"
Soloist, Mme. Louise Homer.
Loeffler
"La Mort de Tintagiles." Symphonic Poem
Viol d'Amore, Mr. Emil Ferir.
Verdi........"O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos"
Mme. Homer.
Beethoven................"Leonora No. 1," Overture

The concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon presented a well-assorted programme not too extreme in any of its numbers, since even Loeffler's romantic and modern production is masterly, tangible, and clear. Goetz's single symphony is seldom heard. It is somewhat of the school of Volkmann's symphonies, concise, regular in form, melodic, and leaning towards the strict classical rather than the free modern style. It is the irony of musical history that your comfortably situated modern composer, with college education, pleasant social position, and large clientele, writes the most bitter and ascetic music, while the poor struggler, such as Goetz, forced to earn his daily bread even while almost helpless with consumption, will compose beautiful melody and generally attractive music.

Yet the modestly-scored and gentle symphony has lost some of its charm. Our viands have been so highly spiced that the simpler food becomes flavorless. That Goetz was very sincere in his music cannot be doubted, and that he found consolation in tones is shown by the motto which he attached to the symphony,—

"Within thy bosom's silent chambers
Seek refuge from the storms of Life."

This is but another form of the words (by Von Schober) which Schubert set to music, which ran thus:—

"Thou Holy Art, how oft in sad grey hours,
When Life's horizon seemed all dark to be,
Hast thou upheld me with thy mighty powers
And oped a purer, better world to me."

The sufferers seem to have found beauty and consolation in Music, while the prosperous moderns find chiefly new progressions, novel combinations of instruments and rhythmic cross-purposes in it.

The scoring is of the simplest, the regular classical forces, plus trombones. But Goetz handles these better than Schumann, and as well as Mendelssohn. There is a little departure from strict form in the first movement, since the subordinate theme and the closing theme are really spun out of the chief theme. The development which follows is masterly, always ingenious, never ugly. There is some affection displayed for the flute in this and in other parts of the symphony, and our excellent flautists deserve honorable mention. The horns and trumpets also were of excellent quality in their copious work.

The first movement is the least interesting of the symphony, in spite of its ingenuity. The second and third movements are veritable gems, containing enough beautiful musical ideas to set up a dozen modern music jugglers, and these were most spontaneously applauded. The dialogue between the horns and trumpets in the Intermezzo was nobly played, and the fluent harmonies of the Adagio were most pleasant to hear.

The Finale was a brilliant movement brilliantly played, but scarcely seemed such a masterpiece as the two movements which preceded it. The work was vociferously applauded and Dr. Muck recalled three times. It is pathetic to remember that the composer was denied the joy of hearing this work when it was given in Vienna, because he had not money enough to pay his railroad fare from Zurich.

It is always a delight to listen to Mme. Louise Homer, and we were glad to notice that, even at the end of an arduous season, the rich quality of her tones was unimpaired. Her numbers were in fine contrast with each other. The Bach air was expressive and pleading, the Gluck number broadly majestic, and the Verdi aria dramatic and sufficiently melodious to appeal to even the least educated auditor. Whether the last of these was quite in place in a symphonic concert may be questioned, but, since Mme. Homer's excellent singing gave such evident pleasure we need not be hyper-critical as to the fitness of the number. In "Oh Pardon Me!" the violin obbligato by Mr. Witek was very effective and the ensemble was excellent.

"Divinites du Styx" does not refer to female golf-champions but is one of Gluck's grandest airs, and its breadth was fairly thrilling.

Of course, however, the Italian operatic selection, less deep, less noble, but more directly melodic, aroused the chief enthusiasm of the concert. Even without being led by the applause of the multitude, we can heartily praise the way in which it was sung. Mme. Homer was certainly in her best vein in this concert.

But every number gave pleasure yesterday and we have seldom heard a symphony concert where the applausive evidence of public appreciation was so continuous.

We are not in sympathy with all of Mr. Loeffler's music and we are against the morbidness of Maeterlinck, but we find much that is beautiful and a great deal that is graphic in the Death of Tintagiles, even if like Tristan and Charles II. he is a long time in dying. The interest is sus- [illegible] hearing the unusual instrument, the Viol D'Amore. This is an instrument like a viola, but with 14 strings, seven of which are under the finger-board and are not played on at all, merely resounding sympathetically to the notes played on the seven strings above the finger-board. The result is a very tender and expressive tone. The harmonics on this instrument are ineffably sweet. Why has it gone out of use? Because it is very difficult to play and requires much tuning. They used to say of the lute-player, that if he lived to be 80 he had probably spent 60 years tuning his instrument, and much the same might be told of the artist upon the Viol d'Amore. But Mr. Ferir played the difficult instrument with much charm and conquered the trying passages easily. No instrument could so fittingly picture Tintagiles as this one, and Mr. Loeffler showed his artistic sense in choosing it.

In fact the composer's orchestral skill is evident in every part of this work. Mr. Loeffler is certainly one of the world's great masters of tone-coloring. He was cbliged to bow his acknowledgments several times from his seat in the gallery, to very long-continued applause.

Beethoven's "Leonora No. 1" is not as good as No. 2, or No. 3, but it is just as well to keep it frcm growing dusty upon the shelf. It is about of the rank of the "Dedication of the House," or of the "Fidelio" overture, which would not be often heard if "Beethoven" had not been the composer's name. However it is just as well not to let the rising generation forget it and its good performance made a dignified end to a concert that had many more pleasing features than some that we can recall.

Miss Florence Hinkle
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra
This Week.

RNAL

Providence, R. I.

APR 12

THERE will be a revival of music in the coming week, and in the last of the Symphony Concerts, a list of several notable programmes will be inaugurated, lasting well into May. Of these there will be a sufficient variety to attract considerable attention for so late a season, including in instrumental work, beside the Boston Symphony Concert, those of the Providence Symphony Orchestra next week and the Strube Ensemble, later.

A concert by Clara Butt and Kennerly Rumford, the English singers, under the managament of Dr. Jordan, will afford another opportunity to hear these noted vocalists, and the last concert in the Steinert series next week will offer both instrumental and vocal attractions in the Longy Wind Choir, and Miss Lucy Marsh, soprano.

Then there will be the ever popular glee club concerts, Harvard with its glee and musical clubs coming to the front on April 29, and on May 1 our own University Glee Club will give its second concert of the season.

From a musical point of view the winter has offered a wide range of entertainment, and in spite of the discontinuance of some activities which had done much for the musical life of the city, there can be no cause to complain that it has been a dull season.

* * *

The sixth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, when the programme will be given in the following order: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Julius Caesar," Handel; "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from "Louise," Charpentier; symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

The soloist will be Miss Florence Hinkle, who has made long progress in the last few years in the favor of the public of this country, until she has come to be recognized as one of the foremost sopranos among concert singers of today. She has already created an agreeable impression on previous appearances in this city, and in Tuesday's programme will sing twice, her first number being the recitative, "E pur cosi," and air, "Piangero la sorte mia," from Handel's opera, "Julius Caesar," and her second number, the famous air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise."

Mozart's symphony in E-flat is one of the three great masterpieces written by him in 1788, which alone would have been sufficient to have brought immortality to their composer had he written nothing else. The symphony in E-flat was dated June 26, that in G-minor on July 25 and the "Jupiter" symphony in C-major on Aug. 10.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" is in five movements which, however, are to be played without pause. This extraordinary Russian has taken typical Spanish dance tunes and treated them with remarkable skill, and although he is a Russian has kept the Spanish flavor to a marked degree. The work was dedicated to the artists of the orchestra of the Imperial Russian Opera House in St. Petersburg, and as such is decidedly a virtuoso piece, displaying at their best all the various soloists of an orchestra.

Liszt's "Symphonie Poem," which is familiar to most audiences, is the best, unquesionably, of those he wrote, and in its influence on the music that followed is one of the most important works of its period.

* * *

Now that the Boston Symphony season is about to come to an end, a backward glance shows much of especial interest in the programmes that have been presented in Providence. Two sopranos, Mme. Gadski and Miss Hinkle; one violinist, Fritz Kreisler, and three pianists, Ruth Deyo, Mme. Theresa Carreno and Paderewski, have been the soloists, and in the programmes which have found general favor the symphonies have been Beethoven's Seventh, Franck's in D-minor, Glazounoff's in B-flat major, Mozart's in E-flat, Schubert's "Unfiinshed" and Tschaikowsky's Fourth.

The other composers represented are Bizet, Brahms, Charpentier, Dvorak, Grieg, Handel, Lalo, Liszt, Mozart, Paderewski, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Smetana, Wagner and Weber. It would probably be difficult to find a list more inclusive of the great masters of music or a list of works more inclusive of the great masterpieces of music in a series of six programmes.

* * *

The third concert [illegible]

---

aper Cutting Bureau

COURANT

HARTFORD, CONN.

APR 8 1914

SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Audience Considers Dr. Muck's Musicians Sufficient.

SPLENDID CONCERT MUCH ENJOYED

Program for Final Appearance of Season Was Varied.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra never played better in Hartford than it did last evening; that seemed to be the general opinion of the music-lovers making up the very large audience that filled the Parsons Theater and applauded every number to the echo. Dr. Muck and his men were in particularly fine form, and the brilliant program offered was very brilliantly played. There was no soloist—but a soloist was highly unnecessary; the orchestra was enough.

Tschaikowsky's wonderfully gladsome, brilliant and effective Symphony No. 4 was given a magnificent rendition. The whole performance was so finely rounded, so satisfying, so filled with the spirit of the joy of living that to pick out any certain parts of the work for commendation seems almost trivial—but not to mention the light of the wood-wind tones in the e measures of the andante; the endid sonorous strings in their song he second movement; the brilliant, ange and captivating scherzo in the incipal part of which not a bow uched a string—lightning pizzicato aying being the rule; and the wonrful tones in the finale; not to speak all these would be a great pity ined.

Each movement of the symphony as rapturously applauded and when r. Muck was called back to the stage r the second time after the symhony was over he, in turn, called on players to rise and share the apause with him.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on anish Themes brings the charming c of Spain before the audience in moods. Most melodic is the work, and in all the melodies runs the strain of plaintiveness seems to characteristic of Spanusic. The serenade and the gypg were odd and charming, the go strange and brilliant. The was full of fire and the seemntaneity that means, in an oronly long and arduous work. s "L'Arlesienne" Suite from its unison melody to the last of ic measures that come in the n" was delightful. The "Minvas particularly charming and odies of the succeeding movere brilliantly played. And came the Liszt "Preludes"— Wagner numbers that many orchestra's admirers had rather for in this concert but a brilsonorous substitute [illegible]

Newspaper

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date APR 9 1914
Established:

STANDARD AT PEABODY IS PHENOMENALLY HIGH

The most striking feature of the musical season this year has undoubtedly been the phenomenally high standard of the Peabody series of concerts and the sustained enthusiasm and unprecedentedly large size of the audiences attending them.

In speaking of the arrangement of the series as a whole, a subject for remark is the almost excessive preponderance of piano recitals, no less than 8 out of the 20 having been devoted to this instrument, though it is impossible for any unprejudiced musician to deny that several of these recitals were, in their different ways, absolute revelations of pianistic perfection. It is deplorable, however, to notice the decline in the number of concerts devoted to chamber music, especially as this is due entirely to the lack of appreciation which these have received in the past, and in no way represents the attitude of those in charge of the series.

Chamber music has always been recognized among true musicians as the supreme test of genuine musical taste, but Baltimore, alas! has, in this respect, failed altogether to rise to the occasion and show itself the cultivated and aesthetic center we would all have it to be. In a word, this city is, like so many other less cultured communities, still under the spell of the "star" ideal.

It is good news that there are already something like 100 new subscribers for next season's concerts by the Philharmonic Society of New York, and it is sincerely to be hoped that the number will be considerably augmented before the list closes, as for a city of this size even the eight concerts given by this orchestra and that of the Boston Symphony combined are all too few.

Somehow or other, in spite of the influential names in the list of the Philharmonic's patrons Baltimore, as a whole, still refuses to consider these concerts as of equal social importance with those of the Boston Symphony Orcehstra. We say "social" because we cannot help feeling that this and not the inferiority of Stransky or his orchestra is really accountable for the difference in the size of the audiences.

Dr. Carl Muck this year, though he has certainly seemed more in touch with his audience here in the matter of program-making than has hitherto been the case, has certainly not added one whit to his great reputation—indeed, one was compelled this season for the first time to realize that he has distinct limitations as a conductor. Allusion has already been made in these columns to the utterly unsympathetic, objective and bold interpretation of Beethoven's great tone poem, the C minor Symphony, which suggested more than anything we have yet heard the orchestral counterpart to a pianola. It seems inexplicable that the same conductor was able to reveals, as no other of the present day can, all the subtlety and inwardness of the equally classical but more remote Fourth Symphony of Brahms. Here, however, is food for reflection. There has been a strong tendency of late years not only among orchestral conductors, but also among pianists and even violinists, to play Beethoven less romantically than of yore, and with as much restraint and as little rubato as possible, and, on the other hand, to give a much freer rein, in these respects, to their interpretations of Bach. This, however, is perhaps a natural reaction from the over-sentimental playing of Beethoven in the past. Most interesting to note is the contrast here between Dr. Muck and his immediate predecessors, Max Fiedler, who gave us an almost ideal interpretation both of the Symphony just referred to and of its still greater successor, the Choral Symphony, but who lamentably failed in his readings of the works of Brahms.

Of the opera season it may be fairly said that the subscribers got their money's worth. While the quality of the casts and the character of the performances generally varied considerably throughout the season, the standard, as a whole, was undoubtedly high. Moreover, Baltimore was introduced for the first time to two very remarkable operatic stars, Titto Ruffo and Martinelli, both of whom surpassed even the very sanguine expectations of an audience prepared in advance to expect great things from them.

On the other hand, much difference of opinion prevailed as to the actual selection of the operas given during the season.

Puccini certainly came in for the lion's share, represented, as he was, by his three most celebrated works, while Verdi was heard only in his Rigoletto, a really immature work not in the least displaying his full powers. Mozart and Weber were not represented at all and Wagner only in "Die Walkure," and this opera, with a singular lack of judgment, was immediately followed by as trifling a piece of music as "The Tales of Hoffmann." One of the sensations of the season was the production of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna," the music of which is sometimes absolutely trivial, sometimes even vicious, but again at times powerful, dramatic and full of color—in a word, a very uneven composition. The defense put forward by some critics that even the weakest moments of the opera are fully justified by the truthfulness which seeks to portray exactly the situation is no defense at all. Mozart's "Don Juan" is practically the setting to music of the various incidents in the life of an unprincipled libertine, and yet, in doing this, Mozart, without sacrificing, for an instant, the truthfulness of the dramatic situation, has given the world perhaps the purest and most intrinsically valuable music in the whole realm of operatic literature. The truth, of course, is that the mission of music is to idealize and not, as is the case with most modern composers, to be so realistic as to sacrifice actual beauty for the sake of exact imitation.

H. D. P.

SCIENCE MONITOR,

APRIL 18, 1914

Visiting Artist Presenting Contralto Arias of Bach, Gluck and Verdi Wins Enthusiastic Acclaim at Symphony Rehearsal

GOETZ PIECE PLAYED

Singing arias that demanded great resource of tone and large technical equipment, Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, appeared as soloist at the twenty-second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and won a reward of applause that but few American artists attain. The leading orchestral number on the program was a symphony by one of the minor German music makers, a work of surpassing beauty in melodic line and of remarkable grace in structure. It was a day when artistic comeliness prevailed; it was also a day when the American ideal in music had its opportunity. For down from the orchestra library shelf with the beautiful symphony Dr. Muck brought a tone poem of Loeffler that for charm of instrumental color and persuasiveness of message is not to be easily matched. To complete things, the music director added one of the small works of Beethoven to his program, which in detail read as follows: Hermann Goetz, symphony in F major, op. 9; Bach, aria (in English) from "St. Matthew," Gluck, aria (in Italian) from "Alceste"; C. M. Loeffler, dramatic poem, "Tintagiles"; Verdi, aria from fourth act of "Don Carlos"; Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No. 1, op. 138.

Success comes to a conductor in a composition like the Goetz symphony if he fully relishes its value as one of the secondary products of the orchestral imagination. A man who tried to interpret this work as one of the sublime achievements of German musical art would make a sad thing of it indeed. The Goetz symphony is a masterpiece of craftmanship only, but when it is presented by a conductor who appreciates it as much, its effect is just as satisfying as if it were the culminating word of German aspiration.

Mme. Homer, singer whose voice has never wholly lost its native American quality from its training in the studios of Europe, sang the old-school arias of Bach and Gluck with dignity of style and impeccable command of phrasing. She sang them in a way to impress her listeners with the power of the music to stand in the company of modern vocal writing. She read them in the feeling of her own time rather than in the time of the early oratorio composer or in that of the early opera composer. She did not infuse them with historic mood. She did not make them documents of early and late eighteenth-century musical Europe. But an artist in her position as opera and concert contralto probably has very little to say about such things. They are no doubt largely determined by the studio drillmasters. And it is a question whether the documentary method of interpretation is the better one anyway. For it often becomes mere musical dressing up that has nothing but illustrative value.

Brilliantly the orchestra presented Mr. Loeffler's music of "Tintagiles." The work is a masterful exploit in descriptive writing, masterful because it gives the mood and emotion of the scenes on which it is based rather than actual pictures. The poem is constructed on the best theory of representative music and it shows an American composer keeping the art of his country on the highest plane.

* * *

RANSCRIPT.

BOSTON EVEN

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GOETZ FOR PLEASURE AND LOEFFLER FOR POWER

A Programme of Contrasts—The Charm of a Little Lyric Symphony That Re[illegible]ed Schubert—The Graphic Imagina[illegible] the Delineative Mastery and the [illegible]ic Force of "The Death of Tintagiles"—[illegible] Interludes by Mme. Homer and Beethove[illegible]

WITH the [illegible] spring hats and the spring [illegible] frocks to Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, [illegible]'s little lyric symphony came Götz[illegible] [illegible]her conductor Dr. Muck cherishes it and [illegible] hear it gladly even though the reviewe[illegible] "nice" little phony. Like many anot[illegible] experience has taught them that audience[illegible]rs dismiss it briefly as a "pretty" or a [illegible] not comthing. After all, why should [illegible]ies and [illegible]posers write little lyric symph[illegible]em at [illegible] why should not orchestras play [illegible]sthet[illegible] becoming intervals? Nobody except [illegible]ic hypocrites and sublimated intellige[illegible] not to be endured in the ordinary co[illegible]merce of concerts, cares for a steady die[illegible] of mighty masterpieces. With symphonies in particular, we that listen are far too much obsessed with the notion that they must be of imposing dimensions and content, form and voice. Brooding or ardent passion must have stirred in the composer and given birth to deeply reflective or flamingly emotional musical thoughts. He must be eloquent with "great ideas" as "greatly" expressed. He must search his own mind and spirit and the cosmos besides. He must grapple with the deep and hidden things of life and fate. He must outpour his passion, his thought, and his communicating eloquence upon us, and if he has written in these exacting days of ours, he must use a huge orchestra with a manifold command of all its voices. By unconscious habit, we almost expect a masterpiece in every symphony. At the very least in our wonted expectation, it must be "something big."

Yet symphonies were once as much in the day's work for composers and their hearers as plays are now for practised playwrights and their public. Mozart and Haydn—to say nothing of countless forgotten composers of the eighteenth century—wrote them by tens and not a few were little lyric symphonies, "pretty" and "nice" as the Viennese reviewers of the day no doubt labelled them. Two of them in fact—one from either composer—impend at the next Symphony Concerts. Even Beethoven, assumed in the common imagination to be always mighty and magniloquent, wrote a "little symphony," the eighth, and himself called it so. From Schubert nowadays we hear only the lengthy ninth and the fragments of "The Unfinished," but more than one of the other eight that gather dust on publishers' and librarians' shelves are little lyric symphonies. And of Schubert, the oftener the symphony of yesterday is played, does Götz seem the heir. Throughout it is lyric music, songful and spontaneous, seeming to upspring from the composer's singing heart. It has the melting Schubertian euphonies and transitions that caress the ear; the harmonic and the instrumental coloring is as soft, transparent and haunting. It escapes the Schubertian prolixity and it has rather more than the Schubertian dexterity. Like Schubert's music, it is the immediate, direct and intimate expression of individual moods and musings with the cosmos far away. Götz and Schubert moulded the symphonic form to instrumental song—and the minor and the later composer with the eagerness that they say tuberculosis kindles in sensitive and imaginative youth that it dooms as it doomed Götz.

So the little lyric symphony was good to hear and not merely for the flowing and translucent song, the dexterities of accent, the brightness and the suavities of tone, the insinuating pace and the light warmth of feeling with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it voice. They filled it with such lovely detail as the horn passages in the scherzo, or with such little feats in sustained song as the playing and the blending of the strings through the slow movement. Yet, of itself, the music smiled out of the performance. Fresh to the ear came the melodies of the beginning, flowing forward in transparent contrast and light tumult. The scherzo was fertile dexterity of fancy in song and not reflective dexterity in the contemporary fashion, of timbres and modulations. The adagio is pure lyric song, with the two melodies upspringing and expanding out of Götz's stirred heart. It is music of sweetness and light, of fine intensities and insinuating mood. It touches the hearts of those that hear. And then the racing and exuberant finale—the old rondo form and substance, sparkling as it was bound to do with instrumental song, yet touched with a subtler and more lyric emotion. Rarely does a symphony, even a "pretty little symphony" give such simple, sincere and

Newspap

From EVENG NEWS
Address: Btimore, Md.
Date APR 9 1914
Established:

STANDARD AT PEABODY IS PHENOMENALLY HIGH

The most striking feature of the musical season this year has undoubtedly been the phenomenally high standard of the Peabody series of concerts and the sustained enthusiasm and unprecedentedly large size of the audiences attending them.

In speaking of the arrangement of the series as a whole, a subject for remark is the almost excessive preponderance of piano recitals, no less than 8 out of the 20 having been devoted to this instrument, though it is impossible for any unprejudiced musician to deny that several of these recitals were, in their different ways, absolute revelations of pianistic perfection. It is deplorable, however, to notice the decline in the number of concerts devoted to chamber music, especially as this is due entirely to the lack of appreciation which these have received in the past, and in no way represents the attitude of those in charge of the series.

Chamber music has always been recognized among true musicians as the supreme test of genuine musical taste, but Baltimore, alas! has, in this respect, failed altogether to rise to the occasion and show itself the cultivated and aesthetic center we would all have it to be. In a word, this city is, like so many other less cultured communities, still under the spell of the "star" ideal.

It is good news that there are already something like 100 new subscribers for next season's concerts by the Philharmonic Society of New York, and it is sincerely to be hoped that the number will be considerably augmented before the list closes, as for a city of this size even the eight concerts given by this orchestra and that of the Boston Symphony combined are all too few.

Somehow or other, in spite of the influential names in the list of the Philharmonic's patrons Baltimore, as a whole, still refuses to consider these concerts as of equal social importance with those of the Boston Symphony Orcehstra. We say "social" because we cannot help feeling that this and not the inferiority of Stransky or his orchestra is really accountable for the difference in the size of the audiences.

Dr. Carl Muck this year, though he has certainly seemed more in touch with his audience here in the matter of program-making than has hitherto been the case, has certainly not added one whit to his great reputation—indeed, one was compelled this season for the first time to realize that he has distinct limitations as a conductor. Allusion has already been made in these columns to the utterly unsympathetic, objective and bold interpretation of Beethoven's great tone poem, the C minor Symphony, which suggested more than anything we have yet heard the orchestral counterpart to a pianola. It seems inexplicable that the same conductor was able to reveals, as no other of the present day can, all the subtlety and inwardness of the equally classical but more remote Fourth Symphony of Brahms. Here, however, is food for reflection. There has been a strong tendency of late years not only among orchestral conductors, but also among pianists and even violinists, to play Beethoven less romantically than of yore, and with as much restraint and as little rubato as possible, and, on the other hand, to give a much freer rein, in these respects, to their interpretations of Bach. This, however, is perhaps a natural reaction from the over-sentimental playing of Beethoven in the past. Most interesting to note is the contrast here between Dr. Muck and his immediate predecessors, Max Fiedler, who gave us an almost ideal interpretation both of the Symphony just referred to and of its still greater successor, the Choral Symphony, but who lamentably failed in his readings of the works of Brahms.

Of the opera season it may be fairly said that the subscribers got their money's worth. While the quality of the casts and the character of the performances generally varied considerably throughout the season, the standard, as a whole, was undoubtedly high. Moreover, Baltimore was introduced for the first time to two very remarkable operatic stars, Titto Ruffo and Martinelli, both of whom surpassed even the very sanguine expectations of an audience prepared in advance to expect great things from them.

On the other hand, much difference of opinion prevailed as to the actual selection of the operas given during the season.

Puccini certainly came in for the lion's share, represented, as he was, by his three most celebrated works, while Verdi was heard only in his Rigoletto, a really immature work not in the least displaying his full powers. Mozart and Weber were not represented at all and Wagner only in "Die Walkure," and this opera, with a singular lack of judgment, was immediately followed by as trifling a piece of music as "The Tales of Hoffmann." One of the sensations of the season was the production of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna," the music of which is sometimes absolutely trivial, sometimes even vicious, but again at times powerful, dramatic and full of color—in a word, a very uneven composition. The defense put forward by some critics that even the weakest moments of the opera are fully justified by the truthfulness which seeks to portray exactly the situation is no defense at all. Mozart's "Don Juan" is practically the setting to music of the various incidents in the life of an unprincipled libertine, and yet, in doing this, Mozart, without sacrificing, for an instant, the truthfulness of the dramatic situation, has given the world perhaps the purest and most intrinsically valuable music in the whole realm of operatic literature. The truth, of course, is that the mission of music is to idealize and not, as is the case with most modern composers, to be so realistic as to sacrifice actual beauty for the sake of exact imitation.

H. D. P.

SCIENCE MONITOR,
APRIL 18, 1914

Visiting Artist Presenting Contralto Arias of Bach, Gluck and Verdi Wins Enthusiastic Acclaim at Symphony Rehearsal

GOETZ PIECE PLAYED

Singing arias that demanded great resource of tone and large technical equipment. Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, appeared as soloist at the twenty-second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and won a reward of applause that but few American artists attain. The leading orchestral number on the program was a symphony by one of the minor German music makers, a work of surpassing beauty in melodic line and of remarkable grace in structure. It was a day when artistic comeliness prevailed; it was also a day when the American ideal in music had its opportunity. For down from the orchestra library shelf with the beautiful symphony Dr. Muck brought a tone poem of Loeffler that for charm of instrumental color and persuasiveness of message is not to be easily matched. To complete things, the music director added one of the small works of Beethoven to his program, which in detail read as follows: Hermann Goetz, symphony in F major, op. 9; Bach, aria (in English) from "St. Matthew," Gluck, aria (in Italian) from "Alceste"; C. M. Loeffler, dramatic poem, "Tintagiles"; Verdi, aria from fourth act of "Don Carlos"; Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No. 1, op. 138.

Success comes to a conductor in a composition like the Goetz symphony if he fully relishes its value as one of the secondary products of the orchestral imagination. A man who tried to interpret this work as one of the sublime achievements of German musical art would make a sad thing of it indeed. The Goetz symphony is a masterpiece of craftmanship only, but when it is presented by a conductor who appreciates it as much, its effect is just as satisfying as if it were the culminating word of German aspiration.

Mme. Homer, singer whose voice has never wholly lost its native American quality from its training in the studios of Europe, sang the old-school arias of Bach and Gluck with dignity of style and impeccable command of phrasing. She sang them in a way to impress her listeners with the power of the music to stand in the company of modern vocal writing. She read them in the feeling of her own time rather than in the time of the early oratorio composer or in that of the early opera composer. She did not infuse them with historic mood. She did not make them documents of early and late eighteenth-century musical Europe. But an artist in her position as opera and concert contralto probably has very little to say about such things. They are no doubt largely determined by the studio drillmasters. And it is a question whether the documentary method of interpretation is the better one anyway. For it often becomes mere musical dressing up that has nothing but illustrative value.

Brilliantly the orchestra presented Mr. Loeffler's music of "Tintagiles." The work is a masterful exploit in descriptive writing, masterful because it gives the mood and emotion of the scenes on which it is based rather than actual pictures. The poem is constructed on the best theory of representative music and it shows an American composer keeping the art of his country on the highest plane.

* * *

RANSCRIPT,
BOSTON EVENI

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GOETZ FOR PLEASURE AND LOEFFLER FOR POWER

A Programme of Contrasts—The Charm of a Little Lyric Symphony That Re- lled Schubert—The Graphic Imagina- cal the Delineative Mastery and the tion, ic Force of "The Death of Tin- Dramat Interludes by Mme. Homer tagiles" — n and Beethove

WITH the spring hats and the frocks to Symphony yesterday afternoon, spring 's little lyric sym- Hall, her conductor Dr. came Götz phony. Like many anot experience has Muck cherishes it and s hear it glad- taught them that audience rs dismiss it ly even though the reviewe "nice" little briefly as a "pretty" or a not com- thing. After all, why should lies and posers write little lyric sympho hem at why should not orchestras play sthet- becoming intervals? Nobody except es, ic hypocrites and sublimated intellige not to be endured in the ordinary commerce of concerts, cares for a steady diet of mighty masterpieces. With symphonies in particular, we that listen are far too much obsessed with the notion that they must be of imposing dimensions and content, form and voice. Brooding or ardent passion must have stirred in the composer and given birth to deeply reflective or flamingly emotional musical thoughts. He must be eloquent with "great ideas" as "greatly" expressed. He must search his own mind and spirit and the cosmos besides. He must grapple with the deep and hidden things of life and fate. He must outpour his passion, his thought, and his communicating eloquence upon us, and if he has written in these exacting days of ours, he must use a huge orchestra with a manifold command of all its voices. By unconscious habit, we almost expect a masterpiece in every symphony. At the very least in our wonted expectation, it must be "something big."

Yet symphonies were once as much in the day's work for composers and their hearers as plays are now for practised playwrights and their public. Mozart and Haydn—to say nothing of countless forgotten composers of the eighteenth century—wrote them by tens and not a few were little lyric symphonies, "pretty" and "nice" as the Viennese reviewers of the day no doubt labelled them. Two of them in fact—one from either composer—impend at the next Symphony Concerts. Even Beethoven, assumed in the common imagination to be always mighty and magniloquent, wrote a "little symphony," the eighth, and himself called it so. From Schubert nowadays we hear only the lengthy ninth and the fragments of "The Unfinished," but more than one of the other eight that gather dust on publishers' and librarians' shelves are little lyric symphonies. And of Schubert, the oftener the symphony of yesterday is played, does Götz seem the heir. Throughout it is lyric music, songful and spontaneous, seeming to upspring from the composer's singing heart. It has the melting Schubertian euphonies and transitions that caress the ear; the harmonic and the instrumental coloring is as soft, transparent and haunting. It escapes the Schubertian prolixity and it has rather more than the Schubertian dexterity. Like Schubert's music, it is the immediate, direct and intimate expression of individual moods and musings with the cosmos far away. Götz and Schubert moulded the symphonic form to instrumental song—and the minor and the later composer with the eagerness that they say tuberculosis kindles in sensitive and imaginative youth that it dooms as it doomed Götz.

So the little lyric symphony was good to hear and not merely for the flowing and translucent song, the dexterities of accent, the brightness and the suavities of tone, the insinuating pace and the light warmth of feeling with which Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it voice. They filled it with such lovely detail as the horn passages in the scherzo, or with such little feats in sustained song as the playing and the blending of the strings through the slow movement. Yet, of itself, the music smiled out of the performance. Fresh to the ear came the melodies of the beginning, flowing forward in transparent contrast and light tumult. The scherzo was fertile dexterity of fancy in song and not reflective dexterity in the contemporary fashion, of timbres and modulations. The adagio is pure lyric song, with the two melodies upspringing and expanding out of Götz's stirred heart. It is music of sweetness and light, of fine intensities and insinuating mood. It touches the hearts of those that hear. And then the racing and exuberant finale—the old rondo form and substance, sparkling as it was bound to do with instrumental song, yet touched with a subtler and more lyric emotion. Rarely does a symphony, even a "pretty little symphony" give such simple, sincere and suffusing pleasure as does this piece of Götz. Like the spring air and the spring lights, it left the audience pleasantly aglow.

The foil and the advance from small things to great and from lyric song to tonal tragedy was Mr. Loeffler's "dramatic poem" (as he now calls it), "The Death of Tintagiles," strangely overlooked these ten years by the conductors of the Symphony Concerts, though, with "A Pagan Poem," it is the most distinguished work of the most distinguished, thus far, of American composers. In both, Mr. Loeffler's music in itself speaks for the superlatives that no more than do it justice. "After Maeterlinck's play of like title" runs the flyleaf. It is a little play for marionettes. One may see it so every summer in Munich and no doubt elsewhere. An invisible voice reads Maeterlinck's bare and piercing prose wherein words become as the stripped nerves of speed and emotion. On the little stage, little figures make the gesture and the movements that seem the reactions to those poignant words. It all seems an old and piteous tale of the powers of darkness wreaking themselves upon innocent and helpless childhood, while foreboding and devoted love may not save. It is gently pitiful; it is very remote; there is not much human quality in it.

The play deeply stirred Mr. Loeffler's imagination; but when he came to translate it into his own medium of music, he virtually recreated it for himself and for his hearers. The little, eerie, remote and piteous drama for marionettes becomes a grim and racking tragedy in tones, filled with portentous, agonizing, foredoomed beings. It evokes pity still—the infinite pity of fated suffering—but it also evokes its tragic awe. The whole scale is ampler; the picture more graphic, the emotional reaction more deep, searching and human. What was curious and touching tale becomes universal tragedy, hardly to be endured, exhausting those that hear and feel. No wonder, perhaps, that the conductors play Mr. Loeffler's music so seldom. A Greek tragedy does not leave its audience more emotionally spent. A modern masterpiece does not more rack its nerves.

In Mr. Loeffler's music the tempest smites the old castle in the deep valley. It is at the end of the world where storms gather their strength to wreak upon men. It is huge and phantasmagoric. In it dwell the powers of darkness—the old queen and her women of Maeterlinck's play. In the music they squat menacing, feeding and devouring themselves with their own baleful broodings. They rustle; they stride; they draw nearer; they work their baleful and implacable will upon the child and upon the sister that would stay them. The furies in Æschylus are not more vivid in word and image than are these beings of Mr. Loeffler's tones. The suggestive and the communicating power of music could hardly be more penetrating and graphic. Over against them, as incarnate to the imagination, as visible almost through the ear, stand the sister and the old man, foreboding, agonizing, helpless, devoted, weary with the great weariness of a fate that creeps upon them and that they cannot withstand. Their music creates itself out of itself, yet in it is the tremulous agony of their souls. And athwart this blackness of coming evil and this pallor of helpless devotion is the fine gleam of the voice of the doomed and piteous child. With divination, Mr. Loeffler gives it to the thin and poignant, the sweet and sexless viola d'amore. Out of a timbre almost, he summons a personage.

Of such is Mr. Loeffler's thematic delineation, and there is little in contemporary music to match it. The tone-poem runs its symphonic course, rising and expanding out of itself as music is bound to do. The severest purist could not reproach it. Yet in that symphonic course moves also the drama, more vivid, more inexorable, more tragic and racking than any players or any scene might make it. The powers of darkness creep upon the shuddering Ygraine and the doomed Tintagiles; apprehension writhes into agony. The child is plucked away; behind the wall of stone and the door of iron the little voice whispers and dies. The sister cries vainly; the inexorable silence seems to choke her wailing. The storm stills itself into the mute blackness of doom fulfilled. Musical development has become the dramatic and the graphic march, the voice and the action, the bearing and the imparting voice of an implacable tragedy of pity and awe, of fate and fear. About this development, harmonic and instrumental coloring, often exceeding subtle but also exceeding vivid, are weaving their tonal atmosphere, and lo! it is the atmosphere of the tragedy. In its kind, "The Death of Tintagiles" is a masterpiece of music. It stands beside, it excels "A Pagan Poem." Who hearing one or both can rightly say that American music is still barren in any high sense of production and distinction, or that it has not in Mr. Loeffler, scanty as his work is in mere quantity, a composer to rank with the illustrious of our fortunate musical time? His music judges and proclaims him—and the more when conductor and orchestra are, as they were yesterday, the inspired actors of its tonal drama.

Between the pleasure of the symphony poem," the rest of the concert seemed only incidents by the way. Mme. Homer sang an air of Bach's "Matthew Passion Music" and Alcestis's invocation to the deities of Hades out of Gluck's opera in tones that for the time had lost much of their wonted resonance, richness and warmth and that at moments were distinctly metallic. She sang both pieces also cautiously and circumspectly as one who was testing her voice and feeling her way along the melodies, thoughtfully shaping her phrases. When, after Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, she [illegible] to the Italian music of Verdi's "Don [illegible] bad rendering something freely, even sweepingly, the gr sorely lacking in the air from touched her phrases and the p music and verse played in her to it was a tired voice and none too a singer still. Not at the end of should singers come—at least in th lassitude of a spring afternoon to phony Cocerts. The other inci

the revival of the first overture t hoven wrote to his much-prelude lio." It lacks the dramatic suspen fellow that is numbered three and pet call flames out of it. But th familiar and passionate recalling o
tan's air of his youth and the exulta
born of "O Namen löse Frende,"
close and many another Bethovenish stroke in chords and progressions. And he lingers over the music that suggests the devoted Leonora even as he does over that of his other heroic figur of woman—the Volumnia to "Coriolan." H. T. P.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date APR 15 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS LAST OF SEASON'S CONCERTS

Large Audience Listens to Interesting Musical Programme at Infantry Hall.—Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist, Wins Generous Applause.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543) .... Mozart
 I. Adagio; Allegro.
 II. Andante.
 III. Menuetto; Trio.
 IV. Finale: Allegro.
Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia" .... Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
 I. Alborada.
 II. Variations.
 III. Alborada.
 IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
 V. Fandango of the Asturias.
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" .... Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine) .... Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause bestowed

---

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established.

Embarrasment of Riches for Music Lovers

The Fourth Concert of the Steinert Series Will be Given on Tuesday Evening, April 21, While on Next Tuesday Evening Will be Given the Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Bertha Boyce of Edgewood Won Prize for Best Easter Carol.

MISS FLORENCE HINKLE.
Soprano Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening.

LOVERS of music may revel in an embarrassment of musical riches this morning and to-night, for Easter Day is with us in all its beauty and significance and Easter music fills the air. The programme of Easter music at the various churches will be found in another column.

The fourth concert of the Steinert series will be given on Tuesday evening, April 21, 1914, when the famous Longy wind choir, Messrs. A. Brooke and A. Battles, flutes; Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom, oboes; Messrs. G. Grisez and P. Mimart, clarinets; Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, horns, and Messrs. P. Sadony and J. Mosbach, bassoons, will appear in concert. Miss Lucy Marsh, soprano, of this city, will be the soloist in the following programme: Petite Symphony in B-flat, Gounod, Longy wind choir; aria, "Thou Brilliant Bird," from "La Perle du Bresil," with flute obligato, F. David, Miss Lucy Marsh; "Feuillet d'Album," Saint-Saens; "Aubade and Ronde de nuit," Gouvy, Longy wind choir; "Le Baiser," Goring Thomas; "Le Printemps," Leo Stern, Miss Lucy Marsh; "Divertissement," op. 36, Bernard, Longy wind choir.

Among the musical organizations in this country the Longy Club, a wood-wind choir devoted to the interpretation of chamber music written for the flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, is unique.

It was not until 1899, when Georges Longy, the French oboe-player, who had been brought to this country by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, associated himself with several other virtuosi in that superb band and founded the Longy Club, that America could boast such an organization and inquisitive music-lovers could hear performances of compositions that previously had been a sealed book to them. The value of such a club to the musical public as a means of enlarging its knowledge of comparatively unknown works cannot be overestimated or prized too highly.

Composed as it is of members of the Boston Symphony, its virtuousity in ensemble playing ranks with the famous Kneisel Quartet. It is more interesting than any of the many fine chamber music organizations now assisting in spreading the gospel of art and melody throughout the country.

Monsieur George Longy (leader and founder of the Longy Club), was born in Abbeville, France, in 1868. In 1886 he won first prize for the oboe at the Conservatoire National de Musique at Paris, and the same year he was engaged at the famous Lemoureux Concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1885 he re-established "La Societe de Marque de Chambre pour Instruments a vent."

M. Longy became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 1888 he became director and conductor of the Boston Orchestral Club, and one year later he founded the Longy Club, so famous to-day.

Honored by the French Government, Monsieur Georges Longy has been an Officier'd Academie since 1895 and Officier d'Instruction Publique since 1911.

Next Tuesday evening brings practically to an end the musical season of 1913-14 with the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The soloist will be the much-admired American soprano, Miss Florence Hinkle. Miss Hinkle has made great progress in her art the last few years and now is regarded as the first soprano among the concert singers of this country. She has sung several times with much success with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck has maintained to the end the remarkably high standard of attractive programmes that he has given to Providence during the past season. The concert begins with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, one of the three great masterpieces in symphonic form which he wrote in the summer of 1788. The best known of these three is the Symphony in C-major called "Jupiter," but the Symphony in E-flat has come to be generally regarded as the greatest of the group. This will make the first part of the programme. After the intermission Miss Hinkle will sing twice and the orchestra will play twice. Miss Hinkle will sing as her first number the recitative "E pur cosi" and air, "Piangero la sorte mie," from Handel's opera, "Julius Caesar." The general public thinks of Handel merely as the composer of "The Messiah" and other oratorios. As a matter of fact, long before he began to write oratorios he wrote operas in the prevailing Italian style, and much of his oratoria material he took from his early operas. In these works, as in the oratorios, his music is distinguished by its stately flow of melody.

Miss Hinkle's second number will be the charming air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise." The orchestral numbers in the second part will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes." Rimsky-Korsakoff from a typical point of view has long been proclaimed as the greatest Russian composer, and in nothing does his genius for instrumentation shine more brightly than in his extraordinary treatmene of popular Spanish tunes which he has written for an orchestra. It is in five parts, but they are played without pause.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," is familiar to the concert-giong public. It is the greatest and best of Liszt's works of this form and has long been poular on the concert stage. The programme in its proper form is as follows: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Julius Caesar," Handel; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from "Louise," Carpentier; Symphonic Peom, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

suffusing pleasure as does this piece of Götz. Like the spring air and the spring lights, it left the audience pleasantly aglow.

The foil and the advance from small things to great and from lyric song to tonal tragedy was Mr. Loeffler's "dramatic poem" (as he now calls it), "The Death of Tintagiles," strangely overlooked these ten years by the conductors of the Symphony Concerts, though, with "A Pagan Poem," it is the most distinguished work of the most distinguished, thus far, of American composers. In both, Mr. Loeffler's music in itself speaks for the superlatives that no more than do it justice. "After Maeterlinck's play of like title" runs the flyleaf. It is a little play for marionettes. One may see it so every summer in Munich and no doubt elsewhere. An invisible voice reads Maeterlinck's bare and piercing prose wherein words become as the stripped nerves of mood and emotion. On the little stage, little figures make the gesture and the movements that seem the reactions to those poignant words. It all seems an old and piteous tale of the powers of darkness wreaking themselves upon innocent and helpless childhood, while foreboding and devoted love may not save. It is gently pitiful; it is very remote; there is not much human quality in it.

The play deeply stirred Mr. Loeffler's imagination; but when he came to translate it into his own medium of music, he virtually recreated it for himself and for his hearers. The little, eerie, remote and piteous drama for marionettes becomes a grim and racking tragedy in tones, filled with portentous, agonizing, foredoomed beings. It evokes pity still—the infinite pity of fated suffering—but it also evokes its tragic awe. The whole scale is ampler; the picture more graphic, the emotional reaction more deep, searching and human. What was curious and touching tale becomes universal tragedy, hardly to be endured, exhausting those that hear and feel. No wonder, perhaps, that the conductors play Mr. Loeffler's music so seldom. A Greek tragedy does not leave its audience more emotionally spent. A modern masterpiece does not more rack its nerves.

In Mr. Loeffler's music the tempest smites the old castle in the deep valley. It is at the end of the world where storms gather their strength to wreak upon men. It is huge and phantasmagoric. In it dwell the powers of darkness—the old queen and her women of Maeterlinck's play. In the music they squat menacing, feeding and devouring themselves with their own baleful broodings. They rustle; they stride; they draw nearer; they work their baleful and implacable will upon the child and upon the sister that would stay them. The furies in Æschylus are not more vivid in word and image than are these beings of Mr. Loeffler's tones. The suggestive and the communicating power of music could hardly be more penetrating and graphic. Over against them, as incarnate to the imagination, as visible almost through the ear, stand the sister and the old man, foreboding, agonizing, helpless, devoted, weary with the great weariness of a fate that creeps upon them and that they cannot withstand. Their music creates itself out of itself, yet in it is the tremulous agony of their souls. And athwart this blackness of coming evil and this pallor of helpless devotion is the fine gleam of the voice of the doomed and piteous child. With divination, Mr. Loeffler gives it to the thin and poignant, the sweet and sexless viola d'amore. Out of a timbre almost, he summons a personage.

Of such is Mr. Loeffler's thematic delineation, and there is little in contemporary music to match it. The tone-poem runs its symphonic course, rising and expanding out of itself as music is bound to do. The severest purist could not reproach it. Yet in that symphonic course moves also the drama, more vivid, more inexorable, more tragic and racking than any players or any scene might make it. The powers of darkness creep upon the shuddering Ygraine and the doomed Tintagiles; apprehension writhes into agony. The child is plucked away; behind the wall of stone and the door of iron the little voice whispers and dies. The sister cries vainly; the inexorable silence seems to choke her wailing. The storm stills itself into the mute blackness of doom fulfilled. Musical development has become the dramatic and the graphic march, the voice and the action, the bearing and the imparting voice of an implacable tragedy of pity and awe, of fate and fear. About this development, harmonic and instrumental coloring, often exceeding subtle but also exceeding vivid, are weaving their tonal atmosphere, and lo! it is the atmosphere of the tragedy. In its kind, "The Death of Tintagiles" is a masterpiece of music. It stands beside, it excels "A Pagan Poem." Who hearing one or both can rightly say that American music is still barren in any high sense of production and distinction, or that it has not in Mr. Loeffler, scanty as his work is in mere quantity, a composer to rank with the illustrious of our fortunate musical time? His music judges and proclaims him—and the more when conductor and orchestra are, as they were yesterday, the inspired actors of its tonal drama.

Between the pleasure of the symphony poem, the rest of the concert seemed only incidents by the way. Mme. Homer sang an air of Bach's "Matthew Passion Music" and Alcestis's invocation to the deities of Hades out of Gluck's opera in tones that for the time had lost much of their wonted resonance, richness and warmth and that at moments were distinctly metallic. She sang both pieces also cautiously and circumspectly as one who was testing her voice and feeling her way along the melodies, thoughtfully shaping her phrases. When, after Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, she passed to the Italian music of Verdi's "Don [illegible]los," her voice had reg[illegible] something

freely, even sweepingly; "the gr
sorely lacking in the air from touched her phrases and the p
music and verse played in her to it was a tired voice and none too l a singer still. Not at the end of should singers come—at least in th
lassitude of a spring afternoon to phony Cocerts. The other inci
the revival of the first overture t
hoven wrote to his much-prelude lio." It lacks the dramatic suspen fellow that is numbered three and pet call flames out of it. But thu familiar and passionate recalling o
tan's air of his youth and the exulta
born of "O Namen löse Frende,"
close and many another Bethovenish stroke in chords and progressions. And he lingers over the music that suggests the devoted Leonora even as he does over that of his other heroic figur of woman—the Volumnia to "Coriolan." H. T. P.

From BULLETIN
Address Providence, R. I.
Date APR 15 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS LAST OF SEASON'S CONCERTS

Large Audience Listens to Interesting Musical Programme at Infantry Hall.—Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist, Wins Generous Applause.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)........Mozart
  I. Adagio; Allegro.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto; Trio.
  IV. Finale: Allegro.
Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia"........................ Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34..........
.... Rimsky-Korsakoff
  I. Alborada.
  II. Variations.
  III. Alborada.
  IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
  V. Fandango of the Asturias.
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"......
.... Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine) .... Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause bes[illegible]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Established.

Embarrasment of Riches for Music Lovers

The Fourth Concert of the Steinert Series Will be Given on Tuesday Evening, April 21, While on Next Tuesday Evening Will be Given the Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Bertha Boyce of Edgewood Won Prize for Best Easter Carol.

MISS FLORENCE HINKLE, oprano Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening.

LOVERS of music may revel in an embarrassment of musical riches this morning and to-night, for Easter Day is with us in all its beauty and significance and Easter music fills the air. The programme of Easter music at the various churches will be found in another column.

The fourth concert of the Steinert series will be given on Tuesday evening, April 21, 1914, when the famous Longy wind choir, Messrs. A. Brooke and A. Battles, flutes; Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom, oboes; Messrs. G. Grisez and P. Mimart, clarinets; Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, horns, and Messrs. P. Sadony and J. Mosbach, bassoons, will appear in concert. Miss Lucy Marsh, soprano, of this city, will be the soloist in the following programme: Petite Symphony in B-flat, Gounod, Longy wind choir; aria, "Thou Brilliant Bird," from "La Perle du Bresil," with flute obligato, F. David, Miss Lucy Marsh; "Feuillet d'Album," Saint-Saens; "Aubade and Ronde de nuit," Gouvy, Longy wind choir; "Le Baiser," Goring Thomas; "Le Printemps," Leo Stern, iss Lucy Marsh; "Divertissement," op. 36, Bernard, Longy wind choir.

Among the musical organizations in this country the Longy Club, a wood-wind choir devoted to the interpretation of chamber music written for the flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, is unique.

It was not until 1899, when Georges Longy, the French oboe-player, who had been brought to this country by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, associated himself with several other virtuosi in that superb band and founded the Longy Club, that America could boast such an organization and inquisitive music-lovers could hear performances of compositions that previously had been a sealed book to them. The value of such a club to the musical public as a means of enlarging its knowledge of comparatively unknown works cannot be overestimated or prized too highly.

Composed as it is of members of the Boston Symphony, its virtuousity in ensemble playing ranks with the famous Kneisel Quarter. It is more interesting than any of the many fine chamber music organizations now assisting in spreading the gospel of art and melody throughout the country.

Monsieur George Longy (leader and founder of the Longy Club), was born in Abbeville, France, in 1886. In 1886 he won first prize for the oboe at the Conservatoire National de Musique at Paris, and the same year he was engaged at the famous Lemoureux Concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1885 he re-established "La Societe de Marque de Chambre pour Instruments a vent."

M. Longy became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 1888 he became director and conductor of the Boston Orchestral Club, and one year later he founded the Longy Club, so famous to-day.

Honored by the French Government, Monsieur Georges Longy has been an Officier'd Academie since 1895 and Officier d'Instruction Publique since 1911.

Next Tuesday evening brings practically to an end the musical season of 1913-14 with the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The soloist will be the much-admired American soprano, Miss Florence Hinkle. Miss Hinkle has made great progress in her art the last few years and now is regarded as the first soprano among the concert singers of this country. She has sung several times with much success with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck has maintained to the end the remarkably high standard of attractive programmes that he has given to Providence during the past season. The concert begins with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, one of the three great masterpieces in symphonic form which he wrote in the summer of 1788. The best known of these three is the Symphony in C-major called "Jupiter," but the Symphony in E-flat has come to be generally regarded as the greatest of the group. This will make the first part of the programme. After the intermission Miss Hinkle will sing twice and the orchestra will play twice. Miss Hinkle will sing as her first number the recitative "E pur cosi" and air, "Piangero la sorte mie," from Handel's opera, "Julius Caesar." The general public thinks of Handel merely as the composer of "The Messiah" and other oratorios. As a matter of fact, long before he began to write oratorios he wrote operas in the prevailing Italian style, and much of his oratoria material he took from his early operas. In these works, as in the oratorios, his music is distinguished by its stately flow of melody.

Miss Hinkle's second number will be the charming air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise." The orchestral numbers in the second part will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes." Rimsky-Korsakoff from a typical point of view has long been proclaimed as the greatest Russian composer, and in nothing does his genius for instrumentation shine more brightly than in his extraordinary treatmene of popular Spanish tunes which he has written for an orchestra. It is in five parts, but they are played without pause.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," is familiar to the concert-giong public. It is the greatest and best of Liszt's works of this form and has long been poular on the concert stage. The programme in its proper form is as follows: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Julius Caesar," Handel; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from "Louise," Carpentier; Symphonic Peom, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

suffusing pleasure as does this piece of Götz. Like the spring air and the spring lights, it left the audience pleasantly aglow.

The foil and the advance from small things to great and from lyric song to tonal tragedy was Mr. Loeffler's "dramatic poem" (as he now calls it), "The Death of Tintagiles," strangely overlooked these ten years by the conductors of the Symphony Concerts, though, with "A Pagan Poem," it is the most distinguished work of the most distinguished, thus far, of American composers. In both, Mr. Loeffler's music in itself speaks for the superlatives that no more than do it justice. "After Maeterlinck's play of like title" runs the flyleaf. It is a little play for marionettes. One may see it so every summer in Munich and no doubt elsewhere. An invisible voice reads Maeterlinck's bare and piercing prose wherein words become as the stripped nerves of mood and emotion. On the little stage, little figures make the gesture and the movements that seem the reactions to those poignant words. It all seems an old and piteous tale of the powers of darkness wreaking themselves upon innocent and helpless childhood, while foreboding and devoted love may not save. It is gently pitiful; it is very remote; there is not much human quality in it.

The play deeply stirred Mr. Loeffler's imagination; but when he came to translate it into his own medium of music, he virtually recreated it for himself and for his hearers. The little, eerie, remote and piteous drama for marionettes becomes a grim and racking tragedy in tones, filled with portentous, agonizing, foredoomed beings. It evokes pity still—the infinite pity of fated suffering—but it also evokes its tragic awe. The whole scale is ampler; the picture more graphic, the emotional reaction more deep, searching and human. What was curious and touching tale becomes universal tragedy, hardly to be endured, exhausting those that hear and feel. No wonder, perhaps, that the conductors play Mr. Loeffler's music so seldom. A Greek tragedy does not leave its audience more emotionally spent. A modern masterpiece does not more rack its nerves.

In Mr. Loeffler's music the tempest smites the old castle in the deep valley. It is at the end of the world where storms gather their strength to wreak upon men. It is huge and phantasmagoric. In it dwell the powers of darkness—the old queen and her women of Maeterlinck's play. In the music they squat menacing, feeding and devouring themselves with their own baleful broodings. They rustle; they stride; they draw nearer; they work their baleful and implacable will upon the child and upon the sister that would stay them. The furies in Æschylus are not more vivid in word and image than are these beings of Mr. Loeffler's tones. The suggestive and the communicating power of music could hardly be more penetrating and graphic. Over against them, as incarnate to the imagination, as visible almost through the ear, stand the sister and the old man, foreboding, agonizing, helpless, devoted, weary with the great weariness of a fate that creeps upon them and that they cannot withstand. Their music creates itself out of itself, yet in it is the tremulous agony of their souls. And athwart this blackness of coming evil and this pallor of helpless devotion is the fine gleam of the voice of the doomed and piteous child. With divination, Mr. Loeffler gives it to the thin and poignant, the sweet and sexless viola d'amore. Out of a timbre almost, he summons a personage.

Of such is Mr. Loeffler's thematic delineation, and there is little in contemporary music to match it. The tone-poem runs its symphonic course, rising and expanding out of itself as music is bound to do. The severest purist could not reproach it. Yet in that symphonic course moves also the drama, more vivid, more inexorable, more tragic and racking than any players or any scene might make it. The powers of darkness creep upon the shuddering Ygraine and the doomed Tintagiles; apprehension writhes into agony. The child is plucked away; behind the wall of stone and the door of iron the little voice whispers and dies. The sister cries vainly; the inexorable silence seems to choke her wailing. The storm stills itself into the mute blackness of doom fulfilled. Musical development has become the dramatic and the graphic march, the voice and the action, the bearing and the imparting voice of an implacable tragedy of pity and awe, of fate and fear. About this development, harmonic and instrumental coloring, often exceeding subtle but also exceeding vivid, are weaving their tonal atmosphere, and lo! it is the atmosphere of the tragedy. In its kind, "The Death of Tintagiles" is a masterpiece of music. It stands beside, it excels "A Pagan Poem." Who hearing one or both can rightly say that American music is still barren in any high sense of production and distinction, or that it has not in Mr. Loeffler, scanty as his work is in mere quantity, a composer to rank with the illustrious of our fortunate musical time? His music judges and proclaims him—and the more when conductor and orchestra are, as they were yesterday, the inspired actors of its tonal drama.

Between the pleasure of the symphony poem," the rest of the concert seemed only incidents by the way. Mme. Homer sang an air of Bach's "Matthew Passion Music" and Alcestis's invocation to the deities of Hades out of Gluck's opera in tones that for the time had lost much of their wonted resonance, richness and warmth and that at moments were distinctly metallic. She sang both pieces also cautiously and circumspectly as one who was testing her voice and feeling her way along the melodies, thoughtfully shaping her phrases. When, after Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, she [illegible] to the Italian music of Verdi's "Don [illegible]" her voice had regaining something freely, even sweepingly; "the grand style" sorely lacking in the air from "Alcestis" touched her phrases and the passion of music and verse played in her tones. Yet it was a tired voice and none too heartened a singer still. Not at the end of a season should singers come—at least in the nervous lassitude of a spring afternoon to the Symphony Cocerts. The other incident was the revival of the first overture that Beethoven wrote to his much-preluded "Fidelio." It lacks the dramatic suspense of its fellow that is numbered three and no trumpet call flames out of it. But thus is the familiar and passionate recalling of Florestan's air of his youth and the exultant coda, born of "O Namen löse Frende," at the close and many another Bethovenish stroke in chords and progressions. And he lingers over the music that suggests the devoted Leonora even as he does over that of his other heroic figur of woman—the Volumnia of the overture to "Coriolan." H. T. P.

APR 15 1914

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS LAST OF SEASON'S CONCERTS

Large Audience Listens to Interesting Musical Programme at Infantry Hall.—Miss Florence Hinkle, Soloist, Wins Generous Applause.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543) ....Mozart
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro.
Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia" .... Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise" .... Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine) .... Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause best

---

rasment of Riches for Music Lovers

Concert of the Steinert Series Will be Given on Tuesday Evening, April 21, While on Next Tuesday Evening Will be Given the Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Bertha Boyce of Edgewood Won Prize for Best Easter Carol.

MISS FLORENCE HINKLE, oprano Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening.

LOVERS of music may revel in an embarrassment of musical riches this morning and to-night, for Easter Day is with us in all its beauty and significance and Easter music fills the air. The programme of Easter music at the various churches will be found in another column.

The fourth concert of the Steinert series will be given on Tuesday evening, April 21, 1914, when the famous Longy wind choir, Messrs. A. Brooke and A. Battles, flutes; Messrs. G. Longy and C. Lenom, oboes; Messrs. G. Grisez and P. Mimart, clarinets; Messrs. F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, horns, and Messrs. P. Sadony and J. Mosbach, bassoons, will appear in concert. Miss Lucy Marsh, soprano, of this city, will be the soloist in the following programme: Petite Symphony in B-flat, Gounod, Longy wind choir; aria, "Thou Brilliant Bird," from "La Perle du Bresil," with flute obligato, F. David, Miss Lucy Marsh; "Feuillet d'Album," Saint-Saens; "Aubade and Ronde de nuit," Gouvy, Longy wind choir; "Le Baiser," Goring Thomas; "Le Printemps," Leo Stern, iss Lucy Marsh; "Divertissement," op. 36, Bernard, Longy wind choir.

Among the musical organizations in this country the Longy Club, a wood-wind choir devoted to the interpretation of chamber music written for the flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon, is unique.

It was not until 1899, when Georges Longy, the French oboe-player, who had been brought to this country by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, associated himself with several other virtuosi in that superb band and founded the Longy Club, that America could boast such an organization and inquisitive music-lovers could hear performances of compositions that previously had been a sealed book to them. The value of such a club to the musical public as a means of enlarging its knowledge of comparatively unknown works cannot be overestimated or prized too highly.

Composed as it is of members of the Boston Symphony, its virtuousity in ensemble playing ranks with the famous Kneisel Quarter. It is more interesting than any of the many fine chamber music organizations now assisting in spreading the gospel of art and melody throughout the country.

Monsieur George Longy (leader and founder of the Longy Club), was born in Abbeville, France, in 1866. In 1886 he won first prize for the oboe at the Conservatoire National de Musique at Paris, and the same year he was engaged at the famous Lemoureux Concerts. In 1887 he became a member of the Opera Comique Orchestra. In 1885 he re-established "La Societe de Marque de Chambre pour Instruments a vent."

M. Longy became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1898. In 1888 he became director and conductor of the Boston Orchestral Club, and one year later he founded the Longy Club, so famous to-day.

Honored by the French Government, Monsieur Georges Longy has been an Officier'd Academie since 1895 and Officier d'Instruction Publique since 1911.

Next Tuesday evening brings practically to an end the musical season of 1913-14 with the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall at 8:15. The soloist will be the much-admired American soprano, Miss Florence Hinkle. Miss Hinkle has made great progress in her art the last few years and now is regarded as the first soprano among the concert singers of this country. She has sung several times with much success with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck has maintained to the end the remarkably high standard of attractive programmes that he has given to Providence during the past season. The concert begins with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, one of the three great masterpieces in symphonic form which he wrote in the summer of 1788. The best known of these three is the Symphony in C-major called "Jupiter," but the Symphony in E-flat has come to be generally regarded as the greatest of the group. This will make the first part of the programme. After the intermission Miss Hinkle will sing twice and the orchestra will play twice. Miss Hinkle will sing as her first number the recitative "E pur cosi" and air, "Piangero la sorte mie," from Handel's opera, "Julius Caesar." The general public thinks of Handel merely as the composer of "The Messiah" and other oratorios. As a matter of fact, long before he began to write oratorios he wrote operas in the prevailing Italian style, and much of his oratoria material he took from his early operas. In these works, as in the oratorios, his music is distinguished by its stately flow of melody.

Miss Hinkle's second number will be the charming air, "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's opera, "Louise." The orchestral numbers in the second part will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes." Rimsky-Korsakoff from a typical point of view has long been proclaimed as the greatest Russian composer, and in nothing does his genius for instrumentation shine more brightly than in his extraordinary treatmene of popular Spanish tunes which he has written for an orchestra. It is in five parts, but they are played without pause.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," is familiar to the concert-giong public. It is the greatest and best of Liszt's works of this form and has long been poular on the concert stage. The programme in its proper form is as follows: Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart; air from "Julius Caesar," Handel; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff; air from "Louise," Carpentier; Symphonic Peom, "Les Preludes," Liszt.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R.
Date Apr 1
Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVE LAST CONCERT OF

Large Audience Listens [illegible] gramme at Infantry H[illegible]

The sixth and last concer[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number, the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543) ....Mozart
- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro.

Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia" .... Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34.................. Rimsky-Korsakoff
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"........................ Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine) .... Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause bestowed after each appearance.

The symphonic poem, "The Preludes," which closed the programme, is numbered three among the twelve similar descriptive pieces which Liszt wrote. In this, as in all of his works of this kind, Liszt shows remakable ability in his handling of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck gave t a fine reading and the number made a brilliant and effective ending to avery interesting programme.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date ....
Established.

LAST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Thoroughly Enjoyable Programme Fittingly Closed a Very Successful Series.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Providence this year was heard in Infantry Hall last evening by a fair-sized audience. A thoroughly enjoyable programme was presented, which formed a fitting conclusion to an exceptionally successful season. The programme in detail was as follows:

Mozart, Symphony, E-flat major (K.543)
- I. Adagio;
- II. Andante;
- III. Menuetto, trio;
- IV. Finale, allegro;

Handel, recitative, "E pur cosi" and Aria, "Piangero la sorte mia," from "Giulio Cesare"
Rimskey-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
- I. Alborada;
- II. Variations;
- III. Alborada;
- IV. Scene and Gypsy song;
- V. Fandango of the Asturias;

Charpentier, Aria, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine)

The Mozart symphony was delightfully refreshing and especially so in contrast with the Rimsky-Korsakoff number. It is one of Mozart's very best, and while perhaps not quite as fine a piece of workmanship as the magnificent G-minor symphony, or even the C-major heard here last year, it is wholly pleasing. It is full of melodies, clear, light, fresh, brilliant, yet simple and simply developed. The last movement with its mocking joviality and startling harmonic and rhythmic surprises is somewhat in the style of Haydn.

The insertion of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Spanish Caprice into the midst of the programme was not wholly satisfactory. It it far from being a great piece of musical writing. The Spanish dance rhythms are exalted above all else and they are the only thing that marks it as Spanish. Otherwise the atmosphere was that which we have come to recognize as Russian. While the interminable meanderings of much of this Russian composer's work were not so apparent here, it plainly disclosed his lack of constructive power. A bit of melody—sometimes beautiful, usually wild and savage—is repeated again and again, but there seems to be no growth or true development. The orchestration is odd, and a tendency is shown to treat the strings and wind instruments as two separate bands, rather than giving to each instrument its individual part.

The Liszt "Preludes," although becoming somewhat hackneyed, was worth hearing. On the whole it is the best of Liszt's symphonic poems, although "Die Ideale" has superior form. It is one of the most successful examples of programme-music, because the motto is less narrative than changes in atmosphere which music is better able to express. Liszt gets atmosphere from the very first announcement of mysterious chords, following the ascending figure in the strings. Gradually he achieves his climax, unloosing all his orchestral technique, and piling climax upon climax. The storm and pastoral passages are rather conventional, but much is made of the martial passage at the end.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Florence Hinckle. She sang her two arias with remarkable purity of tone, especially in the familiar "Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Her high notes were clear and strong, and in the Charpentier aria her judgment of the old and difficult intervals was flawless. Her principal fault seems to be undue restraint giving an impression of labored precision which is lacking in spontaneity and ease, although on occasion she has exhibited these qualities.

Six concerts are announced again for next year—the 34th season. Mme. Schumann-Heinck and Mr. Harold Bauer are to be two of the soloists, the others to be announced later.

TRANSCRIPT.
APRIL 27, 1914

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

REZNICEK'S "NOVELTY" OF THE YEAR

"Schlemihl" Again Stirs Orchestra and Hearers—A Change of Schedule for the Symphony Concerts Next Year and a Visit from the Mendelssohn Choir—Drawing Boston Into Popular "Century" Opera—Plans for the New Season at the Metropolitan—Novel Singers and Operas—The Peaceful End of the Old—Minor Items

By the signs of two engrossed, excited and applauding audiences, warmly laudatory reviews and a conductor and an orchestra enkindled with the piece, Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography—or "Autobiography," as he might more truthfully have called it for those who knew his life—is the best-liked novelty of the year at the Symphony Concerts. Even Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose" at the other pole of contemporary music, was no more eagerly received. As it was soon repeated by general request, so, also, is Reznicek's tone-poem likely to be in one of the earlier concerts of next season. Indeed, the good fortunes of "Schlemihl" on the platform and in the auditorium, and on Saturday no less than on Friday, may bring the companion-piece to it into the repertory for the new season—a "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger" or "The Victor," [illegible] Reznicek portrays in tones the opposite type of man, the unconquerable soul who reaches his determined goal. Yet there Fate overtakes him; he loses wealth and health and fair fortune abandons him into the hands of Death. If in large and diversified power of imagination and expression, "Der Sieger" matches "Schlemihl," it would be interesting to hear. Once more, after some falterings in the course of the present season, the Symphony Orchestra is in its just place and doing its just work in the production of striking new music.

Of all the pieces, written in the image of Strauss's larger tone-poems, none that we have hitherto heard in America has equalled "Schlemihl." It is easy to make a smart saying and to call the "Symphonic Biography" the best pseudo-Strauss that has yet come over-sea. But Reznicek's music is much more than pseudo-Straussian. From Strauss, as from one of the established standards in the music of the time, he has borrowed no more than the general outline of his musical and delineative design and the numbers and diversity of his orchestral apparatus. The working-out, in mass and in detail of his musico-poetic scheme is his own; his vivid and significant themes spring from his own invention; his harmonic and instrumental invention has its own individuality; and he makes in his own way and kind strokes that are worthy of the higher-placed composer—the mighty and magnificent up-surging of the theme of The Man upon all the voices of the orchestra, when for the last time he fronts Destiny; the superb vigor of the music when that theme goes forth from tense and intimate happiness to fight in living and great and wave-like din of the battle of existence. Then, the listener heard no mere tumult of timbres and polyphony; not one but tens of thousands of voices all men and all women indeed are fighting this battle of the strong. It is massive, universal, surgent music such as few composers except Strauss and Mahler have written in our time. To such power Reznicek adds the beauty of his music of happiness and the wild and biting imagination of his sardonic fantasy of neurotic debauchery. Imagination wings his invention of projecting themes and at both concerts Dr. Muck and the orchestra heightened them and every other element and quality in the music. Exactly on edge for masterful and thrilling performance. Dr. Muck once more brought his men out of long and toilsome rehearsal.

H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

From Symphony Hall

Next year, the Symphony Concerts will run a week later than ever before. They will begin well into October, on Friday the sixteenth, and Saturday the seventeenth, and continue for thirty weeks, with the usual six interruptions. Thus they will not end until Friday, May 7, and Saturday, May 8. The cause of this lengthening of the season is a journey of the orchestra to cities like Chicago and Kansas City, that lie farther West than those it annually visits and in which it has not appeared for years. It will make the expedition in the first week in October. Dr. Muck will return a week earlier than usual to make his preparations for it and the orchestra will begin its rehearsals on Sept. 28. He is to conduct through the whole series of concerts in the West.

Transcript
Apr 28/14

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

~~THE PARIS PROSPECTUS OF~~ THE BOSTON OPERA

A Revised Repertory and a Changed List of Singers—Other Details—The Cambridge Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Sundelius's Excellent Singing at the Last of the Current Series—Mr. Fox's Concert—Items and Opinions

At last, from Paris has come the prospectus distributed there for Mr. Russell's season of opera at the Théatre des Champs-Elysées. It is a four-page leaflet neatly printed in black ink and red upon excellent paper. The first page announces: "The Anglo-American Season of Opera, organized by the Boston Opera Company and the Royal Opera of Covent Garden in London," dates it from April 25 to June 30; names Mr. Russell as the Director-General and lists the following advisory committee: Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger, Mr. Gatti-Casazza; Lord Grimthorpe; Mr. V. Higgins, chairman and managing director of Covent Garden, Mr. E. D. Jordan, Mr. Otto Kahn, Mr. Clarence Mackay and the Marquess of Ripon.

The second leaf enumerates the repertory, which differs from that announced here in the inclusion of "Parsifal" and the dropping of "Der Rosenkavalier," in the omission of "La Gioconda" and the substitution of "Pagliacci," "Il Barbiere" "Un Ballo in Maschera" and de Lara's French opera, already heard in Paris, "Les Trois Masques." As the repertory now stands it is:

L'Amore dei Tre Re (new)	Montemezzi
Un Ballo in Maschera	Verdi
Il Barbiere di Siviglia	Rossini
Don Giovanni	Mozart
Francesca da Rimini (new)	Zandonai
Manon Lescaut	Puccini
Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Le Nozze di Figaro	Mozart
Otello	Verdi
Pagliacci	Leoncavallo
Parsifal	Wagner
Tristan und Isolde	Wagner
Les Trois Masques	de Lara

Then follows a list of the singers, conductors and other forces. It differs from the roster published here in the inclusion of the German contingent that presumably will appear in "Parsifal," with Mme. van der Osten of Dresden at its head; of Mme. Kousnezoff, the Franco-Russian soprano, [illegible] likely to visit America next year.

Sopranos and Mezzo-Sopranos—[illegible] oni, Bender-Schaefer, Destinn, Dux, [illegible] Garden, Hempel, Kousnezoff, Leveroni, Matzenauer, Melba, Muzio, Nielsen, Raisa, Teyte and van der Osten.

Tenors—Messrs. Cornelius, Crimi, Ferrari-Fontana, McCormack, Martinelli, Paltrinieri, Sembach and Tanlongo.

Baritones and Basses—Messrs. Amato, Aquistapace, Bender, Cigada, Finss, Kiess, Knüpfer, Ludikar, Malatesta, Marcoux, Scotti, de Segurola, Tavecchia, van Hulst and Wronsky.

Conductors—Messrs. Coates (of Covent Garden), Moranzoni, Monteux, Panizza (of Covent Garden), and Weingartner.

Stage director, Josef Urban of Boston; chorus master, Oreste Sbavaglia of Boston; the chorus of the Boston Opera, and Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

On the third page the leaflet tabulates the prices of seats which range from $8, $6 and $5 for the most [illegible] or the most conspicuous places to eighty, sixty and forty cents for th[illegible] chairs remotest from the stage. It [illegible] also two subscriptions for [illegible] of ten performances. On the last [illegible] is a plan of the theatre and a no[illegible] about various minor changes in th[illegible] arrangements.

The Cambridge "Symphonies"

The annual series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge ended last evening, less heeded than, perhaps, they deserve to be outside the public that is devotedly loyal to them. Eight times in a season it fills Sanders Theatre almost to the last seat. It comes from the officers of the university, from the students—though by no means in so large measure as it might—and from the men and women of "old Cambridge" generally. It receives its concerts for a lower price than any other audiences of the Symphony Orchestra enjoy; for Mr. Higginson, justly estimating the means and the tastes of university people, insists that they shall be kept below the scale that prevails elsewhere. It also hears the orchestra under exceptional advantage. Its full forces cannot be crowded upon the relatively small stage of Sanders Theatre. No more than sixty men go ordinarily to Cambridge and the performance of sundry ultra-modern pieces that exact a huge orchestra is impossible there, no matter how adroitly the various choirs are scaled to the room for them and the exigencies of the score.

On the other hand the flower of the orchestra plays in these Cambridge concerts and within wooden walls. The contemplation of the lines and the colors of Sanders Theatre does not rejoice the eye; but its acoustics are flawless and sensitive. Surrounded by resonant wood, and in a semi-circular auditorium the tone of the orchestra has a vitality, a brightness and richness that its full forces may not always gain in the long rectangle and the duller surfaces of Symphony Hall. Details tell in Cambridge as they do not in Boston, and the several choirs and the instruments that compose them have a more vivid individuality of their own. In Symphony Hall the listener almost always feels a little remote from the orchestra. He is a listener and no more. In Sanders Theatre the more brilliant and responsive acoustics and the close knitting of auditorium to the stage catch him into the orchestra, as it were, and into the very current of the music that it is playing. True, Dr. Muck makes his programme from pieces that he has lately played in Boston or from "standard" items in the repertory; but they "sound" in Sanders Theatre as they never quite "sound" in Symphony Hall, and for the connoisseurs with the orchestra the new sensation is worth the seeking. It compensates and more, as the Cambridge public of the concerts must suspect, for the occasional thrusting upon them of "assisting artists" whom for some reason or other the management engages, but whom it does not bid to the concerts of Boston or New York, or even of Providence and Worcester.

And Mme. Sundelius

Last evening, however, there was no cause for Bostonian grumbling on that score—and the regular Cambridge audience is always content and applausive—for the singer was Mme. Sundelius, deservedly called to a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. It is altogether wise and just that it should summon to its concerts in Boston and New York only singers, pianists and violinists whose rank in their profession corresponds to its rank among orchestras. To do so is incumbent upon it, and usually management and conductor keep faith with themselves, their standards and their audiences. They yield only when pressure, "pull," or superior authority can no longer be withstood, and in those instances, which it is needless to recall, the quality of the "assisting artist" has transparently proved what propulsive forces brought her—it is always she—to the stage of Symphony Hall. On the other hand, it is as incumbent upon the orchestra by engagements for its concerts elsewhere, to give opportunity and prestige to the few young singers, pianists and violinists, who are rising toward its standards, and who may some day earn and deserve its fullest reward. It has so cultivated Miss Hinkle, who in the quality of her voice, her skill in song, her vocal artistry and her interpreting imagination is now the foremost American soprano of the concert room and who is nearly ripe for translation into Symphony Hall. And it has so begun to cultivate Mme Sundelius.

The young singer deserves her good fortune. She is comely to see; she is poised in her "stage manner," over-conscious neither of her audience nor of herself, while she has the nervous force that communicates to her hearers her personality, her tones and her feeling for her music. She sang yesterday the Countess's recitative, awaiting the lingering Susanna, and her wistful air, "Dove Sono?" from Mozart's "Figaro" and Michaela's sentimental air from the scene in the mountains in "Carmen." Mme. Sundelius's voice is an exquisitely clear and transparent soprano; it deserves the word crystalline; it recalls the timbre of Mme. Eames's in her young years. There is not a trace of hardness in it; throughout its range it is very even and very pliant.

In a sense the voice is cool and a little neutral, but there is always a shimmer of color in the tones and a suggestion of feeling so chaste and poised that it over-shuns any excess or feigning. The light of a clear autumn day, with the sun shining brightly, implies be[illegible] the individu[illegible]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R.

Date

Est

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVE LAST CONCERT OF

Large Audience Listens gramme at Infantry H

The sixth and last concert Boston Symphony Orchestra w Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number, the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)........Mozart
- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale; Allegro.

Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia"........ Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34........ Rimsky-Korsakoff
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"........ Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine)........ Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause bestowed after each appearance.

The symphonic poem, "The Preludes," which closed the programme, is numbered three among the twelve similar descriptive pieces which Liszt wrote. In this, as in all of his works of this kind, Liszt shows remarkable ability in his handling of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck gave a fine reading and the number made a brilliant and effective ending to a very interesting programme.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

Established.

LAST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Thoroughly Enjoyable Programme Fittingly Closed a Very Successful Series.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Providence this year was heard in Infantry Hall last evening by a fair-sized audience. A thoroughly enjoyable programme was presented, which formed a fitting conclusion to an exceptionally successful season. The programme in detail was as follows:

Mozart, Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)
- I. Adagio;
- II. Andante;
- III. Menuetto, trio;
- IV. Finale, allegro;

Handel, recitative, "E pur cosi" and Aria, "Piangero la sorte mia," from "Giulio Cesare"
Rimskey-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
- I. Alborada;
- II. Variations;
- III. Alborada;
- IV. Scene and Gypsy song;
- V. Fandango of the Asturias;

Charpentier, Aria, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine)

The Mozart symphony was delightfully refreshing and especially so in contrast with the Rimsky-Korsakoff number. It is one of Mozart's very best, and while perhaps not quite as fine a piece of workmanship as the magnificent G-minor symphony, or even the C-major heard here last year, it is wholly pleasing. It is full of melodies, clear, light, fresh, brilliant, yet simple and simply developed. The last movement with its mocking joviality and startling harmonic and rhythmic surprises is somewhat in the style of Haydn.

The insertion of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Spanish Caprice into the midst of the programme was not wholly satisfactory. It it far from being a great piece of musical writing. The Spanish dance rhythms are exalted above all else and they are the only thing that marks it as Spanish. Otherwise the atmosphere was that which we have come to recognize as Russian. While the interminable meanderings of much of this Russian composer's work were not so apparent here, it plainly disclosed his lack of constructive power. A bit of melody—sometimes beautiful, usually wild and savage—is repeated again and again, but there seems to be no growth or true development. The orchestration is odd, and a tendency is shown to treat the strings and wind instruments as two separate bands, rather than giving to each instrument its individual part.

The Liszt "Preludes," although becoming somewhat hackneyed, was worth hearing. On the whole it is the best of Liszt's symphonic poems, although "Die Ideale" has superior form. It is one of the most successful examples of programme-music, because the motto is less narrative than changes in atmosphere which music is better able to express. Liszt gets atmosphere from the very first announcement of mysterious chords, following the ascending figure in the strings. Gradually he achieves his climax, unloosing all his orchestral technique, and piling climax upon climax. The storm and pastoral passages are rather conventional, but much is made of the martial passage at the end.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Florence Hinckle. She sang her two arias with remarkable purity of tone, especially in the familiar "Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Her high notes were clear and strong, and in the Charpentier aria her judgment of the old and difficult intervals was flawless. Her principal fault seems to be undue restraint giving an impression of labored precision which is lacking in spontaneity and ease, although on occasion she has exhibited these qualities.

Six concerts are announced again for next year—the 34th season. Mme. Schumann-Heinck and Mr. Harold Bauer are to be two of the soloists, the others to be announced later.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 27, 1914

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

REZNICEK'S "NOVELTY" OF THE YEAR

"Schlemihl" Again Stirs Orchestra and Hearers—A Change of Schedule for the Symphony Concerts Next Year and a Visit from the Mendelssohn Choir—Drawing Boston Into Popular "Century" Opera—Plans for the New Season at the Metropolitan—Novel Singers and Operas—The Peaceful End of the Old—Minor Items

BY the signs of two engrossed, excited and applauding audiences, warmly laudatory reviews and a conductor and an orchestra enkindled with the piece, Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography—or "Autobiography," as he might more truthfully have called it for those who knew his life—is the best-liked novelty of the year at the Symphony Concerts. Even Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose" at the other pole of contemporary music, was no more eagerly received. As it was soon repeated by general request, so, also, is Reznicek's tone-poem likely to be in one of the earlier concerts of next season. Indeed, the good fortunes of "Schlemihl" on the platform and in the auditorium, and on Saturday no less than on Friday, may bring the companion-piece to it into the repertory for the new season—a "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," or "The Victor" [illegible] Reznicek portrays in tones the opposite type of man, the unconquerable soul who reaches his determined goal. Yet there Fate overtakes him; he loses wealth and health and fair fortune abandons him into the hands of Death. If in large and diversified power of imagination and expression, "Der Sieger" matches "Schlemihl," it would be interesting to hear. Once more, after some falterings in the course of the present season, the Symphony Orchestra is in its just place and doing its just work in the production of striking new music.

Of all the pieces, written in the image of Strauss's larger tone-poems, none that we have hitherto heard in America has equalled "Schlemihl." It is easy to make a smart saying and to call the "Symphonic Biography" the best pseudo-Strauss that has yet come over-sea. But Reznicek's music is much more than pseudo-Straussian. From Strauss, as from one of the established standards in the music of the time, he has borrowed no more than the general outline of his musical and delineative design and the numbers and diversity of his orchestral apparatus. The working-out, in mass and in detail of his musico-poetic scheme is his own; his vivid and significant themes spring from his own invention; his harmonic and instrumental invention has its own individuality; and he makes in his own way and kind strokes that are worthy of the higher-placed composer—the mighty and magnificent up-surging of the theme of The Man upon all the voices of the orchestra, when for the last time he fronts Destiny; the superb vigor of the music when that theme goes forth from tense and intimate happiness to fight in living and great and wave-like din of the battle of existence. Then, the listener heard no mere tumult of timbres and polyphony; not one but tens of thousands of voices all men and all women indeed are fighting this battle of the strong. It is massive, universal, surgent music such as few composers except Strauss and Mahler have written in our time. To such power Reznicek adds the beauty of his music of happiness and the wild and biting imagination of his sardonic fantasy of neurotic debauchery. Imagination wings his invention of projecting themes and at both concerts Dr. Muck and the orchestra heightened them and every other element and quality in the music. Exactly on edge for masterful and thrilling performance. Dr. Muck once more brought his men out of long and toilsome rehearsal.

H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

From Symphony Hall

NEXT year, the Symphony Concerts will run a week later than ever before. They will begin well into October, on Friday the sixteenth, and Saturday the seventeenth, and continue for thirty weeks, with the usual six interruptions. Thus they will not end until Friday, May 7, and Saturday, May 8. The cause of this lengthening of the season is a journey of the orchestra to cities like Chicago and Kansas City, that lie farther West than those it annually visits and in which it has not appeared for years. It will make the expedition in the first week in October. Dr. Muck will return a week earlier than usual to make his preparations for it and the orchestra will begin its rehearsals on Sept. 28. He is to conduct through the whole series of concerts in the West.

28/14

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

~~THE PARIS~~ PROSPECTUS OF THE BOSTON OPERA

A Revised Repertory and a Changed List of Singers—Other Details—The Cambridge Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Sundelius's Excellent Singing at the Last of the Current Series—Mr. Fox's Concert—Items and Opinions

AT last, from Paris has come the prospectus distributed there for Mr. Russell's season of opera at the Theatre des Champs-Elysées. It is a four-page leaflet neatly printed in black ink and red upon excellent paper. The first page announces: "The Anglo-American Season of Opera, organized by the Boston Opera Company and the Royal Opera of Covent Garden in London," dates it from April 25 to June 30; names Mr. Russell as the Director-General and lists the following advisory committee: Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger, Mr. Gatti-Casazza; Lord Grimthorpe; M. V. Higgins, chairman and managing director of Covent Garden, Mr. E. D. Jordan, Mr. Otto Kahn, Mr. Clarence Mackay and the Marquess of Ripon.

The second leaf enumerates the repertory, which differs from that announced here in the inclusion of "Parsifal" and the dropping of "Der Rosenkavalier," in the omission of "La Gioconda" and the substitution of "Pagliacci," "Il Barbiere" "Un Ballo in Maschera" and de Lara's French opera, already heard in Paris, "Les Trois Masques." As the repertory now stands it is:

L'Amore dei Tre Re (new)	Montemezzi
Un Ballo in Maschera	Verdi
Il Barbiere di Siviglia	Rossini
Don Giovanni	Mozart
Francesca da Rimini (new)	Zandonai
Manon Lescaut	Puccini
Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Le Nozze di Figaro	Mozart
Otello	Verdi
Pagliacci	Leoncavallo
Parsifal	Wagner
Tristan und Isolde	Wagner
Les Trois Masques	de Lara

Then follows a list of the singers, conductors and other forces. It differs from the roster published here in the inclusion of the German contingent that presumably will appear in "Parsifal," with Mme. van der Osten of Dresden at its head; of Mme. Kousnesoff, the Franco-Russian soprano, [illegible] likely to visit America next year

Sopranos and Mezzo-sopranos—Mmes. Bellincioni, Bender-Schaefer, Destinn, Dux, Edvina, Garden, Hempel, Kousnezoff, Leveroni, Matzenauer, Melba, Muzio, Nielsen, Raisa, Teyte and van der Osten.

Tenors—Messrs. Cornelius, Crimi, Ferrari-Fontana, McCormack, Martinelli, Paltrinieri, Sembach and Tanlongo.

Baritones and Basses—Messrs. Amato, Aquistapace, Bender, Cigada, Fonss, Kiess, Knüpfer, Ludikar, Malatesta, Marcoux, Scotti, de Segurola, Tavecchia, van Hulst and Wronsky.

Conductors—Messrs. Coates (of Covent Garden), Moranzoni, Monteux, Panizza (of Covent Garden), and Weingartner.

Stage director, Josef Urban of Boston; chorus master, Oreste Sbavaglia of Boston; the chorus of the Boston Opera, and Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

On the third page the leaflet [redacted] the prices of seats which ran om $8, $6 and $5 for the most desi or the most conspicuous places to ghty, sixty and forty cents for th hairs remotest from the stage. It es also two subscriptions for se of ten performances. On the last is a plan of the theatre and a no bout various minor changes in th ernal arrangements.

The Cambridge "Symphonies"

The annual series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge ended last evening, less heeded than, perhaps, they deserve to be outside the public that is devotedly loyal to them. Eight times in a season it fills Sanders Theatre almost to the last seat. It comes from the officers of the university, from the students—though by no means in so large measure as it might—and from the men and women of "old Cambridge" generally. It receives its concerts for a lower price than any other audiences of the Symphony Orchestra enjoy; for Mr. Higginson, justly estimating the means and the tastes of university people, insists that they shall be kept below the scale that prevails elsewhere. It also hears the orchestra under exceptional advantage. Its full forces cannot be crowded upon the relatively small stage of Sanders Theatre. No more than sixty men go ordinarily to Cambridge and the performance of sundry ultra-modern pieces that exact a huge orchestra is impossible there, no matter how adroitly the various choirs are scaled to the room for them and the exigencies of the score.

On the other hand the flower of the orchestra plays in these Cambridge concerts and within wooden walls. The contemplation of the lines and the colors of Sanders Theatre does not rejoice the eye; but its acoustics are flawless and sensitive. Surrounded by resonant wood, and in a semi-circular auditorium the tone of the orchestra has a vitality, a brightness and richness that its full forces may not always gain in the long rectangle and the duller surfaces of Symphony Hall. Details tell in Cambridge as they do not in Boston, and the several choirs and the instruments that compose them have a more vivid individuality of their own. In Symphony Hall the listener almost always feels a little remote from the orchestra. He is a listener and no more. In Sanders Theatre the more brilliant and responsive acoustics and the close knitting of auditorium to the stage catch him into the orchestra, as it were, and into the very current of the music that it is playing. True, Dr. Muck makes his programme from pieces that he has lately played in Boston or from "standard" items in the repertory; but they "sound" in Sanders Theatre as they never quite "sound" in Symphony Hall, and for the connoisseurs with the orchestra the new sensation is worth the seeking. It compensates and more, as the Cambridge public of the concerts must suspect, for the occasional thrusting upon them of "assisting artists" whom for some reason or other the management engages, but whom it does not bid to the concerts of Boston or New York, or even of Providence and Worcester.

And Mme. Sundelius

Last evening, however, there was no cause for Bostonian grumbling on that score—and the regular Cambridge audience is always content and applausive—for the singer was Mme. Sundelius, deservedly called to a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. It is altogether wise and just that it should summon to its concerts in Boston and New York only singers, pianists and violinists whose rank in their profession corresponds to its rank among orchestras. To do so is incumbent upon it, and usually management and conductor keep faith with themselves, their standards and their audiences. They yield only when pressure, "pull," or superior authority can no longer be withstood, and in those instances, which it is needless to recall, the quality of the "assisting artist" has transparently proved what propulsive forces brought her—it is always she—to the stage of Symphony Hall. On the other hand, it is as incumbent upon the orchestra by engagements for its concerts elsewhere, to give opportunity and prestige to the few young singers, pianists and violinists, who are rising toward its standards, and who may some day earn and deserve its fullest reward. It has so cultivated Miss Hinkle, who in the quality of her voice, her skill in song, her vocal artistry and her interpreting imagination is now the foremost American soprano of the concert room and who is nearly ripe for translation into Symphony Hall. And it has so begun to cultivate Mme Sundelius.

The young singer deserves her good fortune. She is comely to see; she is poised in her "stage manner," over-conscious neither of her audience nor of herself, while she has the nervous force that communicates to her hearers her personality, her tones and her feeling for her music. She sang yesterday the Countess's recitative, awaiting the lingering Susanna, and her wistful air, "Dove Sono?" from Mozart's "Figaro" and Michaela's sentimental air from the scene in the mountains in "Carmen." Mme. Sundelius's voice is an exquisitely clear and transparent soprano; it deserves the word crystalline; it recalls the timbre of Mme. Eames's in her young years. There is not a trace of hardness in it; throughout its range it is very even and very pliant.

In a sense the voice is cool and a little neutral, but there is always a shimmer of color in the tones and a suggestion of feeling so chaste and poised that it over-shuns any excess or feigning. The light of a clear autumn day, with the sun shining brightly, implies be the individual

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date [illegible] 1914
Est
884

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES LAST CONCERT OF SEASON

Large Audience Listens to Programme at Infantry Hall.

The sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Miss Florence Hinkle, soloist, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," which constituted the orchestral fare, were given a brilliant performance by Dr. Muck's band of virtuosi. These numbers were finely contrasted, the Mozart Symphony with its more simple but beautiful orchestration being followed by the striking and almost barbaric tone coloring of the Russian "Caprice," the somewhat Wagnerian Symphonic Poem of Liszt providing a brilliant closing number.

Miss Hinkle sang a Recitative and Air from Handel's "Guilio Cesare," in which Cleopatra, captive, laments her condition, and for her second number, the Aria "Depuis le jour" from Charpentier's "Louise," a song of love and happiness by Louise to her lover, Julian. The order of the programme was as follows:

Symphony, E-flat major (K. 543)........Mozart
- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro.

Recitative, "E Pur Cosi," and air, "Piangero la Sorte Mia"........Handel
Caprice on Spanish Themes, op. 34........Rimsky-Korsakoff
- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

Air, "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise"........Charpentier
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine)........Liszt

Of the 41 symphonies by Mozart, the three written in the year 1788 are his greatest, all of which were finished within the short period of a little over six weeks. The first of these, the one in E-flat, was performed last evening. This work, a masterpiece of pure music, shows Mozart's characteristic freedom and clearness of instrumentation. The splendid "Introduction" and spirited "Allegro" are followed by an "Andante" of serenity and great beauty, and the stately "minuet" by the joyous vigor of the "Finale."

In the days of Mozart, when the symphony was scored for fewer instruments, the effect was necessarily less massive than in the orchestral works of to-day, in which are employed instruments unknown in those earlier days.

In spite of the fact, however, that the beautiful and melodious symphonies of Haydn and Mozart are far more simple than the gigantic polyphonic writings of the moderns, they nevertheless are calculated to severely test the abilities of orchestral players. Passages of great delicacy for wood wind instruments, for example, unless played with perfect intonation, may ruin a whole movement. The truth of this was shown on more than one occasion in the Mozart symphony last evening.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most popular orchestral works by the famous Russian and is a good answer to the notion that sombreness is inseparable from Russian music. In this tremendously brilliant and very original composition so full of strange rythm and odd effects the orchestra played with the utmost fire and precision.

The orchestral works of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in which national sentiment is so deeply rooted, are for the most part breezy and gay rather than touched with the melancholy which is characteristic of the works of his fellow countryman Tschaikowsky.

Miss Hinkle's two appearances were in arias in which the sentiment was as widely separated as the poles. In the Handel recitative and aria she was less successful in portraying the wretchedness of the fallen Cleopatra than in giving expression to the ecstacy which filled the breast of Louise in the Charpentier aria. Her voice, a lyric soprano, is pure in quality and is of considerable power. Her intonation was very correct with the exception of a few high notes which were sung a trifle sharp. Her performance of the two difficult arias was, on the whole, exceedingly good and merited the generous applause bestowed after each appearance.

The symphonic poem, "The Preludes," which closed the programme, is numbered three among the twelve similar descriptive pieces which Liszt wrote. In this, as in all of his works of this kind, Liszt shows remarkable ability in his handling of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck gave a fine reading and the number made a brilliant and effective ending to a very interesting programme.

NCERT OF ONY SEASON

hly Enjoyable Progra Fittingly Closed a Very Successful Series.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Providence this year was heard in Infantry Hall last evening by a fair-sized audience. A thoroughly enjoyable programme was presented, which formed a fitting conclusion to an exceptionally successful season. The programme in detail was as follows:

Mozart, Symphony, E-flat major (K.543)
- I. Adagio;
- II. Andante;
- III. Menuetto, trio;
- IV. Finale, allegro;

Handel, recitative, "E pur cosi" and Aria, "Piangero la sorte mia," from "Giulio Cesare"
Rimskey-Korsakoff, Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
- I. Alborada;
- II. Variations;
- III. Alborada;
- IV. Scene and Gypsy song;
- V. Fandango of the Asturias;

Charpentier, Aria, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes" (after Lamartine)

The Mozart symphony was delightfully refreshing and especially so in contrast with the Rimsky-Korsakoff number. It is one of Mozart's very best, and while perhaps not quite as fine a piece of workmanship as the magnificent G-minor symphony, or even the C-major heard here last year, it is wholly pleasing. It is full of melodies, clear, light, fresh, brilliant, yet simple and simply developed. The last movement with its mocking joviality and startling harmonic and rhythmic surprises is somewhat in the style of Haydn.

The insertion of the Rimsky-Korsakoff Spanish Caprice into the midst of the programme was not wholly satisfactory. It it far from being a great piece of musical writing. The Spanish dance rhythms are exalted above all else and they are the only thing that marks it as Spanish. Otherwise the atmosphere was that which we have come to recognize as Russian. While the interminable meanderings of much of this Russian composer's work were not so apparent here, it plainly disclosed his lack of constructive power. A bit of melody—sometimes beautiful, usually wild and savage—is repeated again and again, but there seems to be no growth or true development. The orchestration is odd, and a tendency is shown to treat the strings and wind instruments as two separate bands, rather than giving to each instrument its individual part.

The Liszt "Preludes," although becoming somewhat hackneyed, was worth hearing. On the whole it is the best of Liszt's symphonic poems, although "Die Ideale" has superior form. It is one of the most successful examples of programme-music, because the motto is less narrative than changes in atmosphere which music is better able to express. Liszt gets atmosphere from the very first announcement of mysterious chords, following the ascending figure in the strings. Gradually he achieves his climax, unloosing all his orchestral technique, and piling climax upon climax. The storm and pastoral passages are rather conventional, but much is made of the martial passage at the end.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Florence Hinckle. She sang her two arias with remarkable purity of tone, especially in the familiar "Depuis le jour" from "Louise." Her high notes were clear and strong, and in the Charpentier aria her judgment of the old and difficult intervals was flawless. Her principal fault seems to be undue restraint giving an impression of labored precision which is lacking in spontaneity and ease, although on occasion she has exhibited these qualities.

Six concerts are announced again for next year—the 34th season. Mme. Schumann-Heinck and Mr. Harold Bauer are to be two of the soloists, the others to be announced later.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 27, 1914

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

REZNICEK'S "NOVELTY" OF THE YEAR

"Schlemihl" Again Stirs Orchestra and Hearers—A Change of Schedule for the Symphony Concerts Next Year and a Visit from the Mendelssohn Choir—Drawing Boston Into Popular "Century" Opera—Plans for the New Season at the Metropolitan—Novel Singers and Operas—The Peaceful End of the Old—Minor Items

BY the signs of two engrossed, excited and applauding audiences, warmly laudatory reviews and a conductor and an orchestra enkindled with the piece, Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography—or "Autobiography," as he might more truthfully have called it for those who knew his life—is the best-liked novelty of the year at the Symphony Concerts. Even Ravel's suite, "Mother Goose" at the other pole of contemporary music, was no more eagerly received. As it was soon repeated by general request, so, also, is Reznicek's tone-poem likely to be in one of the earlier concerts of next season. Indeed, the good fortunes of "Schlemihl" on the platform and in the auditorium, and on Saturday no less than on Friday, may bring the companion-piece to it into the repertory for the new season—a "satirical" symphony, "Der Sieger," or "The Victor," [illegible] Reznicek portrays in tones the opposite type of man, the unconquerable soul who reaches his determined goal. Yet there Fate overtakes him; he loses wealth and health and fair fortune abandons him into the hands of Death. If in large and diversified power of imagination and expression, "Der Sieger" matches "Schlemihl," it would be interesting to hear. Once more, after some falterings in the course of the present season, the Symphony Orchestra is in its just place and doing its just work in the production of striking new music.

Of all the pieces, written in the image of Strauss's larger tone-poems, none that we have hitherto heard in America has equalled "Schlemihl." It is easy to make a smart saying and to call the "Symphonic Biography" the best pseudo-Strauss that has yet come over-sea. But Reznicek's music is much more than pseudo-Straussian. From Strauss, as from one of the established standards in the music of the time, he has borrowed no more than the general outline of his musical and delineative design and the numbers and diversity of his orchestral apparatus. The working-out, in mass and in detail of his musico-poetic scheme is his own; his vivid and significant themes spring from his own invention; his harmonic and instrumental invention has its own individuality; and he makes in his own way and kind strokes that are worthy of the higher-placed composer—the mighty and magnificent up-surging of the theme of The Man upon all the voices of the orchestra, when for the last time he fronts Destiny; the superb vigor of the music when that theme goes forth from tense and intimate happiness to fight in living and great and wave-like din of the battle of existence. Then, the listener heard no mere tumult of timbres and polyphony; not one but tens of thousands of voices all men and all women indeed are fighting this battle of the strong. It is massive, universal, surgent music such as few composers except Strauss and Mahler have written in our time. To such power Reznicek adds the beauty of his music of happiness and the wild and biting imagination of his sardonic fantasy of neurotic debauchery. Imagination wings his invention of projecting themes and at both concerts Dr. Muck and the orchestra heightened them and every other element and quality in the music. Exactly on edge for masterful and thrilling performance. Dr. Muck once more brought his men out of long and toilsome rehearsal.

H. T. P.

NEWS OF MUSIC

From Symphony Hall

NEXT year, the Symphony Concerts will run a week later than ever before. They will begin well into October, on Friday the sixteenth, and Saturday the seventeenth, and continue for thirty weeks, with the usual six interruptions. Thus they will not end until Friday, May 7, and Saturday, May 8. The cause of this lengthening of the season is a journey of the orchestra to cities like Chicago and Kansas City, that lie farther West than those it annually visits and in which it has not appeared for years. It will make the expedition in the first week in October. Dr. Muck will return a week earlier than usual to make his preparations for it and the orchestra will begin its rehearsals on Sept. 28. He is to conduct through the whole series of concerts in the West.

[illegible] 28/14

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE ~~PARIS~~ PROSPECTUS OF THE BOSTON OPERA

A Revised Repertory and a Changed List of Singers—Other Details—The Cambridge Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Sundelius's Excellent Singing at the Last of the Current Series—Mr. Fox's Concert—Items and Opinions

AT last, from Paris has come the prospectus distributed there for Mr. Russell's season of opera at the Theatre des Champs-Elysées. It is a four-page leaflet neatly printed in black ink and red upon excellent paper. The first page announces: "The Anglo-American Season of Opera, organized by the Boston Opera Company and the Royal Opera of Covent Garden in London," dates it from April 25 to June 30; names Mr. Russell as the Director-General and lists the following advisory committee: Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger, Mr. Gatti-Casazza; Lord Grimthorpe; H. V. Higgins, chairman and managing director of Covent Garden, Mr. E. D. Jordan, Mr. Otto Kahn, Mr. Clarence Mackay and the Marquess of Ripon.

The second leaf enumerates the repertory, which differs from that announced here in the inclusion of "Parsifal" and the dropping of "Der Rosenkavalier," in the omission of "La Gioconda" and the substitution of "Pagliacci," "Il Barbiere" "Un Ballo in Maschera" and de Lara's French opera, already heard in Paris, "Les Trois Masques." As the repertory now stands it is:

L'Amore dei Tre Re (new)........Montemezzi
Un Ballo in Maschera........Verdi
Il Barbiere di Siviglia........Rossini
Don Giovanni........Mozart
Francesca da Rimini (new)........Zandonai
Manon Lescaut........Puccini
Die Meistersinger........Wagner
Le Nozze di Figaro........Mozart
Otello........Verdi
Pagliacci........Leoncavallo
Parsifal........Wagner
Tristan und Isolde........Wagner
Les Trois Masques........de Lara

Then follows a list of the singers, conductors and other forces. It differs from the roster published here in the inclusion of the German contingent that presumably will appear in "Parsifal," with Mme. van der Osten of Dresden at its head; of Mme. Kousnezoff, the Franco-Russian soprano, [illegible] likely to visit America next year [illegible]

Sopranos and Mezzo-Sopranos—Mmes. [illegible]oni, Bender-Schaefer, Destinn, Dux, Edvina, Garden, Hempel, Kousnezoff, Leveroni, Matzenauer, Melba, Muzio, Nielsen, Raisa, Teyte and van der Osten.

Tenors—Messrs. Cornelius, Crimi, Ferrari-Fontana, McCormack, Martinelli, Paltrinieri, Sembach and Tanlongo.

Baritones and Basses—Messrs. Amato, Aquistapace, Bender, Cigada, Fonss, Kiess, Knüpfer, Ludikar, Malatesta, Marcoux, Scotti, de Segurola, Tavecchia, van Hulst and Wronsky.

Conductors—Messrs. Coates (of Covent Garden), Moranzoni, Monteux, Panizza (of Covent Garden), and Weingartner.

Stage director, Josef Urban of Boston; chorus master, Oreste Sbavaglia of Boston; the chorus of the Boston Opera, and Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

On the third page the leaflet [redacted]bulates the prices of seats which ran[redacted] from $8, $6 and $5 for the most desir[redacted] or the most conspicuous places to[redacted]ghty, sixty and forty cents for th[redacted]airs remotest from the stage. It [redacted]es also two subscriptions for se[redacted] of ten performances. On the last [redacted] is a plan of the theatre and a no[redacted]bout various minor changes in th[redacted]ernal arrangements.

The Cambridge "Symphonies"

The annual series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge ended last evening, less heeded than, perhaps, they deserve to be outside the public that is devotedly loyal to them. Eight times in a season it fills Sanders Theatre almost to the last seat. It comes from the officers of the university, from the students—though by no means in so large measure as it might—and from the men and women of "old Cambridge" generally. It receives its concerts for a lower price than any other audiences of the Symphony Orchestra enjoy; for Mr. Higginson, justly estimating the means and the tastes of university people, insists that they shall be kept below the scale that prevails elsewhere. It also hears the orchestra under exceptional advantage. Its full forces cannot be crowded upon the relatively small stage of Sanders Theatre. No more than sixty men go ordinarily to Cambridge and the performance of sundry ultra-modern pieces that exact a huge orchestra is impossible there, no matter how adroitly the various choirs are scaled to the room for them and the exigencies of the score.

On the other hand the flower of the orchestra plays in these Cambridge concerts and within wooden walls. The contemplation of the lines and the colors of Sanders Theatre does not rejoice the eye; but its acoustics are flawless and sensitive. Surrounded by resonant wood, and in a semi-circular auditorium the tone of the orchestra has a vitality, a brightness and richness that its full forces may not always gain in the long rectangle and the duller surfaces of Symphony Hall. Details tell in Cambridge as they do not in Boston, and the several choirs and the instruments that compose them have a more vivid individuality of their own. In Symphony Hall the listener almost always feels a little remote from the orchestra. He is a listener and no more. In Sanders Theatre the more brilliant and responsive acoustics and the close knitting of auditorium to the stage catch him into the orchestra, as it were, and into the very current of the music that it is playing. True, Dr. Muck makes his programme from pieces that he has lately played in Boston or from "standard" items in the repertory; but they "sound" in Sanders Theatre as they never quite "sound" in Symphony Hall, and for the connoisseurs with the orchestra the new sensation is worth the seeking. It compensates and more, as the Cambridge public of the concerts must suspect, for the occasional thrusting upon them of "assisting artists" whom for some reason or other the management engages, but whom it does not bid to the concerts of Boston or New York, or even of Providence and Worcester.

And Mme. Sundelius

Last evening, however, there was no cause for Bostonian grumbling on that score—and the regular Cambridge audience is always content and applausive—for the singer was Mme. Sundelius, deservedly called to a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. It is altogether wise and just that it should summon to its concerts in Boston and New York only singers, pianists and violinists whose rank in their profession corresponds to its rank among orchestras. To do so is incumbent upon it, and usually management and conductor keep faith with themselves, their standards and their audiences. They yield only when pressure, "pull," or superior authority can no longer be withstood, and in those instances, which it is needless to recall, the quality of the "assisting artist" has transparently proved what propulsive forces brought her—it is always she—to the stage of Symphony Hall. On the other hand, it is as incumbent upon the orchestra by engagements for its concerts elsewhere, to give opportunity and prestige to the few young singers, pianists and violinists, who are rising toward its standards, and who may some day earn and deserve its fullest reward. It has so cultivated Miss Hinkle, who in the quality of her voice, her skill in song, her vocal artistry and her interpreting imagination is now the foremost American soprano of the concert room and who is nearly ripe for translation into Symphony Hall. And it has so begun to cultivate Mme Sundelius.

The young singer deserves her good fortune. She is comely to see; she is poised in her "stage manner," over-conscious neither of her audience nor of herself, while she has the nervous force that communicates to her hearers her personality, her tones and her feeling for her music. She sang yesterday the Countess's recitative, awaiting the lingering Susanna, and her wistful air, "Dove Sono?" from Mozart's "Figaro" and Michaela's sentimental air from the scene in the mountains in "Carmen." Mme. Sundelius's voice is an exquisitely clear and transparent soprano; it deserves the word crystalline; it recalls the timbre of Mme. Eames's in her young years. There is not a trace of hardness in it; throughout its range it is very even and very pliant.

In a sense the voice is cool and a little neutral, but there is always a shimmer of color in the tones and a suggestion of feeling so chaste and poised that it over-shuns any excess or feigning. The light of a clear autumn day, with the sun shining brightly, implies best the [illegible]

[illegible] sings with secure and expert intelligence and resources that flower into artistry. Her declamation of the Countess's recitative was good to hear as sustained, pointed and cumulating speech of song. She sang the air with as fine a sense of the long Mozartean line, the linked and flowing phrases, the felicities of vocal accent and transition, the mood of wistful melancholy. Here were purity and poise, because summoning them and ordering them was sense of vocal style. The same feeling for sustained song, for rounded phrase, for vocal proportion and flowing design, and the same ability to evoke the mood and the individual quality of the music distinguished Mme. Sundelius's singing of Michaela's air. Music by Bizet, sentimental and direct, do not sound to her and to her hearers, like the crystalline measures and the subtle and spontaneous shadings of Mozart.

Reznicek's Remarkable Music

His New Tone-Poem at the Symphony Concerts Between Mozart and Haydn

By H. T. P.

EXTREMES met in the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon when it began with Mozart's little symphony in D major, dated 1786, and proceeded with Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography: Schlemihl," dated—emphatically 1912. In matter and in manner Mozart's symphony is altogether of its time. Three movements suffice for it—a slow Introduction leading into a spirited Allegro; a songful Andante, and the nievitable sparkling Rondo for the Finale. If at that time Mozart had begun to write slow introductions by way of new departure in his symphonies, as yet he seldom included minuets as quasi-scherzos in them. Similarly the symphony is altogether of Mozart writing at his ease in the relatively happy years at Prague. The Introduction, with its stout unisons and vigorous chords, with little figures and turns racing upward between them, begins in proper semblance of the dignified accomplishment of a serious task before a gravely attentive audience in powdered periwigs and its brocaded skirts. The music almost summons the yellow candle-light in which they sat listening. According to the chronicles of the time, they found the transition into the Allegro "surprising" and counted the music generally "swift and fiery."

In this 1914, nobody is "surprised" at the transition, artfully as Dr. Muck devised it; everybody will agree that the symphony is "swift," especially under the conductor's light and elastic pace and accent; while some of us will like to fancy that even now there are darts of Mozart's white fire in it—shadowed in the Introduction, bright and clear in the Allegro, flashing, like dancing sunlight, in the Finale. Light as they are in this symphony, Mozart's musical thoughts seem to spring into life out of chords and unisons that are a kind of heralding for them; quickly out of the attendant figures, they are expanding into melody that in the Allegro beats to a glad rhythm and in the Finale to one that tingles gaily. Fancy begins to weave arabesques around them and they run their course of transparent development in diaphanous tones. Mozart's harmonies and timbres are not recondite even for these days, rather they are as spontaneous as his melodies; but, unlike not a few of our latter-day strivings with both, each stroke counts. The ear hears it in the music; the eye does not merely note it on the engraved page. The whole symphony is glad music and in the Andante, it is artful music, too, in the delicate suspensions, the melting phrases, the sunny little arabesques, the upwelling song, as though Mozart loved it for its own releasing sake. From the heart he wrote, though in the day's work he may not have thought twice whence the impulse came.

Pure Mozart, if ever he wrote such music, is this symphony, and through most of its course yesterday it sounded like pure Mozart even though a big orchestra was playing it. The euphonies, the suavities, the floritura of the wind choir in the Andante and the glint of the strings in the Finale might have rejoiced Mozart's ear. In the one the music kept its soft texture and its luminous transparency; in the other it lost not a sparkle of its clear brightness. Possibly, however, though it is perilous to speculate about hearing in the Elysian Fields, he might have listened less gladly to the chords and other more heavily accented passages in the symphony. Try as conductor and men may—and Dr. Muck is not as sensitive in this respect as he might be—the sheer tonal mass of the string makes the emphasis and the contrast too weighty and so upsets the proportion of the music and halts its winged pace. Mozart heard no such volume of emphatic tone as he wrote; there ought to be some way for a large orchestra in a big hall to avoid this innocent violence to the airiest and most diaphanous music that man has yet written.

It is the intrinsic quality of Mozart's music and not the relative size of his orchestra and ours that makes this mass and this emphasis perilous to it. Haydn used an orchestra relatively little larger than Mozart's; but the playing of his symphony in B-flat at the end of the concert brought no thought of disproportionate power and stress in the string choirs. Haydn's music is stouter-fibred; the ornament is less delicate; the melodic curve less sensitively plastic; the texture is not so diaphanous; the rhythm and movement less light-footed; the expressive quality more direct. Sentiment in the eighteenth1century sense of the word smiled or mused out of Mozart's symphony; homelier feeling sang out of Haydn's. Where Mozart is graceful, as in his allegro, Haydn with his is lively. Where Mozart is gay, as in his rondo, Haydn in his Finale of contra-dances is exuberant. Mozart's song in his slow movement rambles where fancy leads it; Haydn's expands with the waxing of honest feeling. The stouter music of the lesser man so bears the weight of tone and the energy of accent that string-choirs nowadays and conductors too instinctively and innocently give to it. The proportions and the intrinsic quality of Haydn's music seldom seem to suffer under performance in a big hall by a big orchestra, when the conductor brings such understanding and expertness to it as Dr. Muck and the men did yesterday. To some of us, in the heavier or the staccato passages, Mozart's music under similar conditions does not quite sound like [illegible] over

Reznicek's tone-poem, played between the two symphonies and separated from each by an isolating pause, is no masterpiece, but it is well designed, well accomplished, stoutly imagined, highly interesting and once and again largely impressive music. The model in more respects than one is easy to discover—the larger tone-poems of Strauss from "Ein Heldenleben," through the "Sinfonia Domestica." Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography" has in its degree not a few of the virtues of its prototypes and it has also an individuality of its own. Reznicek is no second Strauss, since he lacks the wondrous projecting powers and the irresistible force of the greater composer whereby his music lays hold upon the minds and seizes the imaginations of those that hear. Therein lies Strauss's genius and Reznicek is no more than a composer of ripe talent feeling the musical impulses and walking in the musical ways of his German time and catching not a little of its sentimentalizings and philosophizings as he pursues his course.

Reznicek follows many of the Straussian procedures and uses a very large and diversified orchestra Straussian wise. He utilizes the procedure and he employs the orchestra with ability and to result. He is not filling out forms because they are the regular thing in the regular way—a process quite as possible in an "advanced" tone-poem as in an academic symphony. He does not merely contemplate the magnitude of means with internal satisfactions and little else after the manner of many a young composer of this day. He works his forms as he uses his orchestra, with imaginative design, imaginative invention, plentiful ability and plentiful outcome. He has set himself a job in composition of a certain sort and manfully, ably and impressively he has accomplished it. But it is har to believe this "Symphonic Biography" th spontaneous and irrepressible expression o Reznicek's mind and spirit; when as wit Strauss's tone-poems, early and late, an with his music-drama, the listener realize that they are inevitable to the compose that he could think and feel in no othe way and express himself in no other, dow to the least of his harmonies and timbres or up to the most intricate of his polyphony. Strauss, at his best, is little short of genius; Reznicek at his fullest is only plentiful and excited talent.

Following aptly the Straussian model, which is now the model of most German composers of middle age, the musical and the emotional, pictorial and quasi-philosophic doings of the "Symphonic Biography," mate well. Like "Ein Heldeneben,"l Reznicek veils an intrinsically symphonic form behind the glamoring veils of the freedom of a tone-poem. There is a clear first movement in which the proclamation, the ripening and the play of his tonal images follows freely but perceptibly the orthodox outline. Without break and skilful transition, the music becomes a scherzo, in the contemporary sense of mood and form; an unmistakable slow movement follows and culminates; and there is long and vivid transition into a finale that might be the end of a symphony in the free delineative sense. Reznicek often disdains the orthodox symmetries and interrelations, as every composer, with imagination, individuality and vital purpose does nowadays; but he has keen sense of form; he makes his music rise steadily out of itself; and he is astute in the correlating repetition of his tonal images in the themes of The Man and the voice of the Destiny, which are the creature and the contending forces of tone-poem.

For the poetic design, as the convenient words go, of this "Symphonic Biography" is the picturing of the life of a Man harmed and ultimately conquered by Fate. The Man is only "Schlemikl," a vague and generic term for a restless human spirit, it was with itself and existence, rising to ideal heights, sinking to vile depths and tortured always by implacable Fate. The first movement flings out the tonal image of The Man and it does strike the imagination. Reznicek has imagined and proclaimed it well. It runs its course in the music as with youthful energy and confidence. The sombre and hollow voice of Fate—another well-imagined and well-projected tonal imagination warms and menaces it. The music shrills into the higher registers of the instruments, cracks into dissonances, falls into gasping progressions, turns restless and black. The spirit of The Man is beginning to sink and shatter.

In the scherzo that ensues it has sunk into debauches of the imagination and the flesh. The "orgy," as Reznicek's notes eo the score call it, is not an honest "orgy" in the old-fashioned sense in which Berlioz and Tschaikowsky wrote such music. Rather it is a neurotic orgy, in which The Man sees sinister, mocking, distorted images, companions with them, receives uncanny sensations and vile pleasures from them. His body is in some haunt of the vulgarly dissolute—hear rhythms like to those of Charpentier's Montmartre in "Julien"—but his mind is filled with the images of debauched sensibility and debased imagination. The figures out of Beardsley "Comedy-Ballet of Marionettes," forgotten these ten years in England and America, but still vivid in Germany, torture him like the imps of dreams—the hump-backed flute player, the insinuating and evil singing woman, the perverted dancer. Gross images cross his brain—harridans riding sows like a new and abased sort of witches. He hears vaguely a debauched dance tune. So through the scherzo, the music whistles with sharp-set timbres, screams with dissonance, titillates with vulgar progressions, lays blurred and changeful tonal outlines upon the ear, transmogrifying itself as by neurotic or drugging impulse. Yet with all this effort it is the least vivid music in the whole tone-poem. These is atmosphere of its kind in plenty; but there is no means all the fantastic suggestion that Reznicek seeks. He specifies too many images for music to carry.

Again the Voice of Destiny warns and menaces through the shrillness; tumult and titillation still and the music advances into the Adagio of conjugal happiness. The Man Lover: The Woman, a tonal image worthy of Strauss in its ingratiating, insinuating and rexed quality, returns his love. The child's voice pipes affectionately to them. The music swells into delicate and intimate glorification of their devotion and happiness. The themes expand into melodies, in intertwine glamorously and touchingly and there are moments of beautiful music seductive in their suggestion of inner and tense feeling. Now shall he go forth conquering to conquer. Once more one of Reznicek's striking themes proclaims him. Then, the inevitable polyphonic battles and harmonic and instrumental agonies. The combat waxes, wisps of themes, like the ghost of the Huns before Rome, battle in the air; Reznicek harries his orchestra; it in turn harries his tonal images; the man remembers old happinesses and old prides and the agony of rememberance is sharper than the agony of defeat. The Voice of Fate, dooming nof, sounds across the stress of this living; the tumult in exhaustion. It has been thrilling in the rush, the power, the ordered wildness of its tonal kind. The music falls as into a black pit of silence broken only by the echoing voice of fate, ominous, awaiting, implacable.

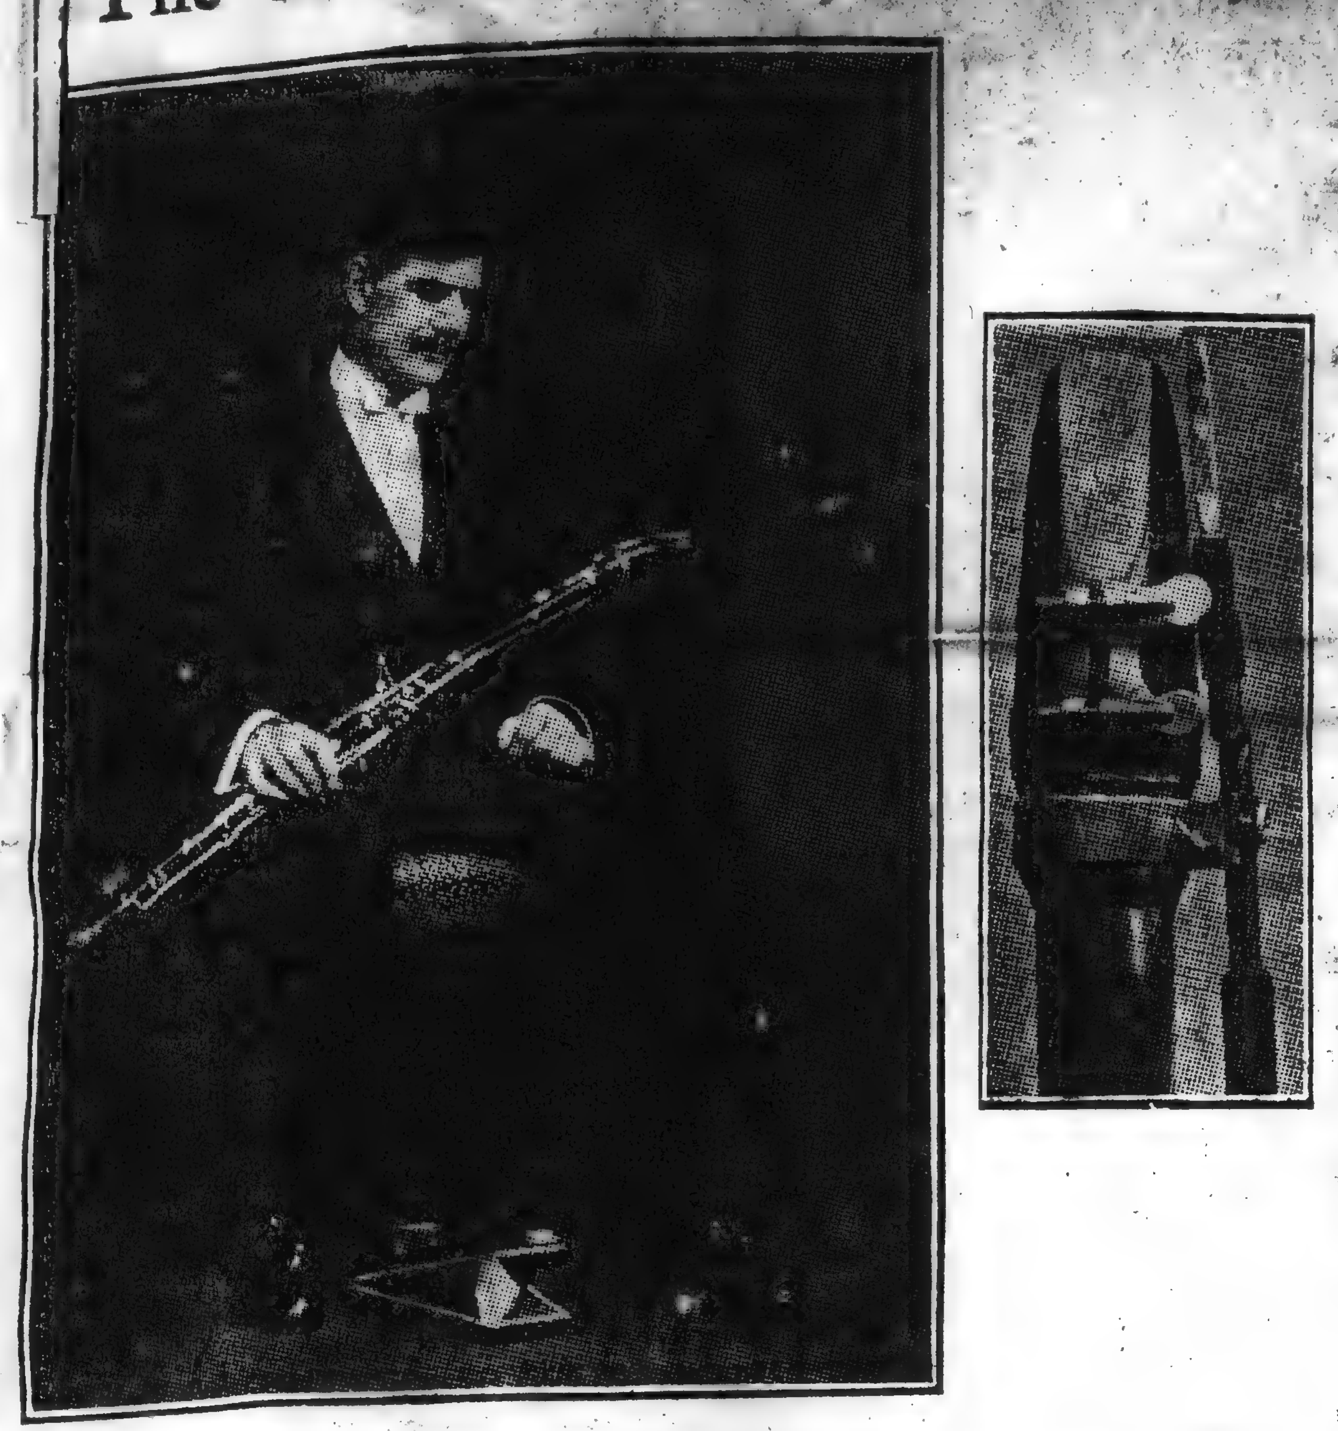
Then out of the depths in spent strength and weary agony, The Man cries for mercy. Reznicek—mistakely perhaps—gives his prayer a tenor voice—Mr. Shirley's yesterday—above a hushed orchestra, gave an artificial contrast and not a climax, and unimpressive music. Destiny answers not. The theme of The Man—a great theme now—singes up through the whole orchestra to front Fate for the last time; its voice is like the hymn of the thousands so striving and smitten. Then, of a sudden, Reznicek transmogrifies his theme, it shivers and falls away before our ears and the fragments are wafted away on music that parts and vanishes into wisps into the air. "Vanity of vanities," saith the Preacher, all is vanity—except the power, the pleasure and the excitement of recording

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

NEXT Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at the twenty-fourth and last pair of Symphony Concerts for the musical year, Dr. Muck will fulfill a long-standing purpose—the revival of Saint-Saëns's symphony in C minor with organ. It has not been played here since the composer conducted in it himself at a concert in his honor at Symphony Hall, six or seven years ago. Dr. Muck intended to revive it last season; illness then defeated him; and other obstacles have since stood in the way, until he set to the making of his final programme for the spring. In design and in substance the symphony is by far the best work in the kind that Saint-Saëns has done. The organ part is considerable, conspicuous and significant, written by a composer who is both a master-organist and an expert symphonist. Mr. Marshall, the regular organist of the orchestra, who has been little heard this year, will play it. For the second half of the programme, Dr. Muck has joined three classics of music from the beginning of the eighteenth well through the nineteenth century; one of Bach's "Brandenburg" concertos for strings; Beethoven's overture to the tragedy, "Corilanus" and Wagner's prelude to his operatic comedy, "Die Meistersinger." An exultant close of a season in which conductor and orchestra have surpassed themselves.

The Revolutionary Aerophor

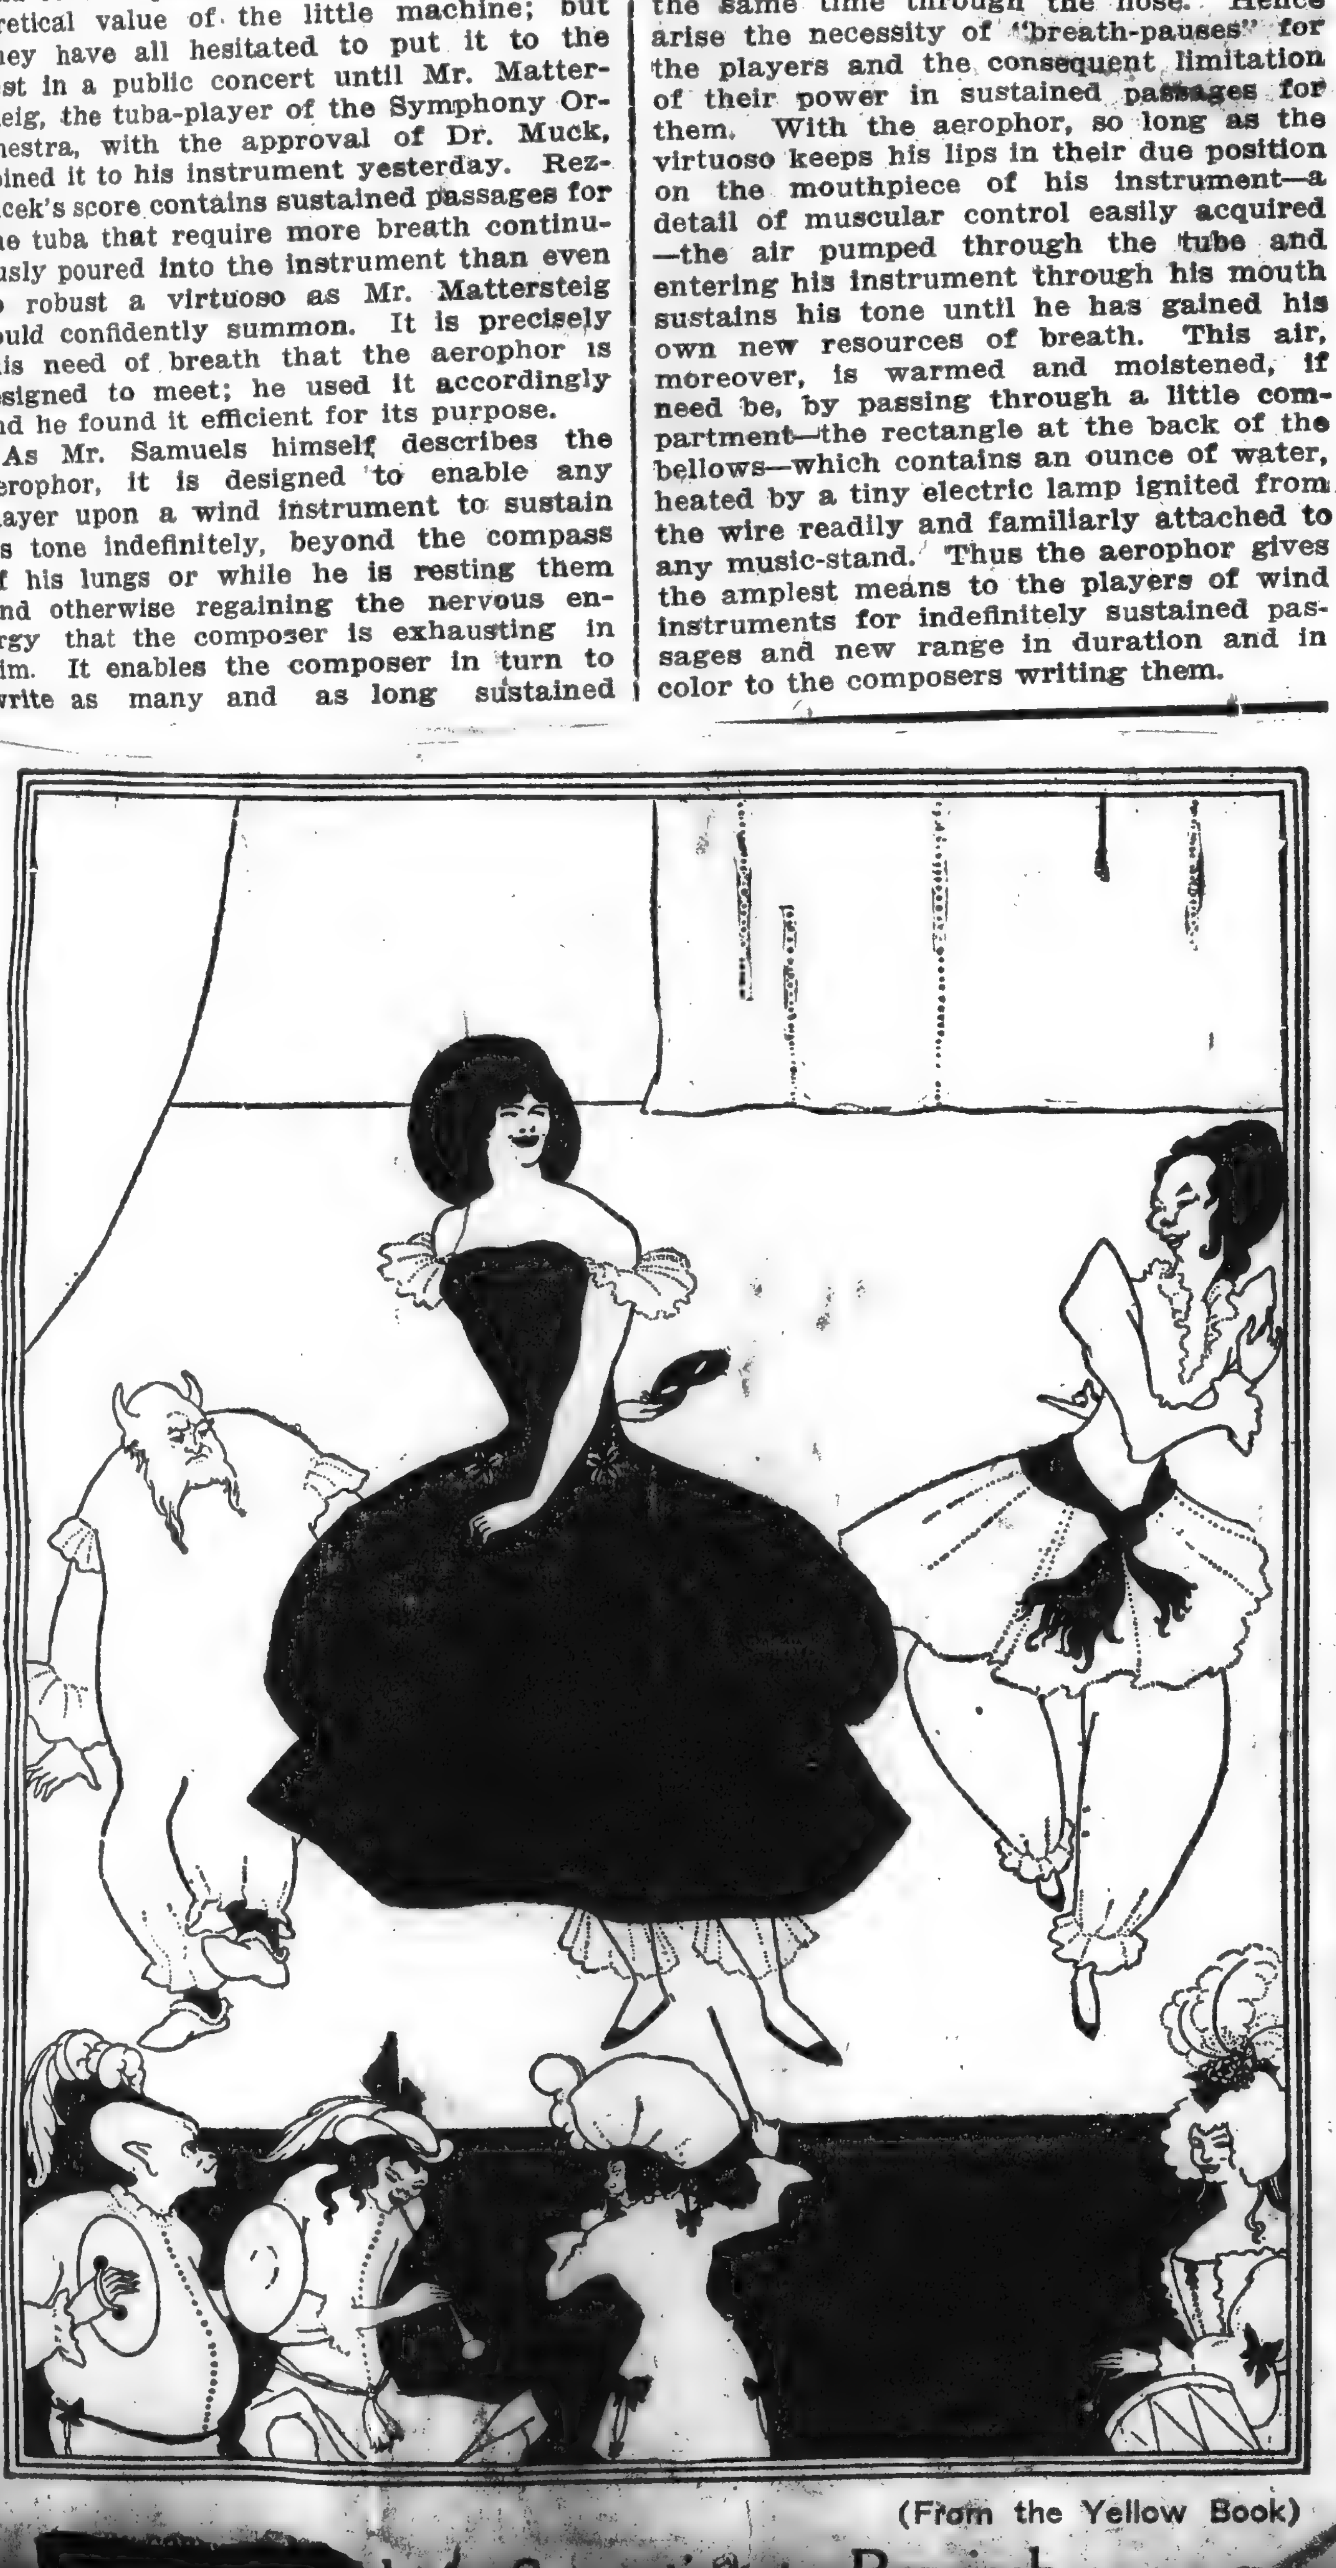


An Invention Giving New Powers to Wind Instruments Tested at the Symphony Concert

IN the performance of Reznicek's "Symphonic Biography: Schlemihl" at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the newly invented aerophor was used for the first time, probably, in a public concert in this country and certainly for the first time in a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. The invention itself is of barely a year's standing and hitherto it has been tested in Europe only in a few performances of Strauss's "Festival Prelude" in which the composer himself suggested the use of it by the tuba-players in the sustaining of the long phrases he had written for them. A few weeks ago, the inventor, Bernard Samuels, a Dutch flutist, brought the aerophor to America, showed it to Dr. Muck, Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Hertz and the wind-choirs of the Boston and the Metropolitan orchestra and gave private demonstrations of its utility. The conductors, the virtuosi and other expert judges perceived the theoretical value of the little machine; but they have all hesitated to put it to the test in a public concert until Mr. Mattersteig, the tuba-player of the Symphony Orchestra, with the approval of Dr. Muck, joined it to his instrument yesterday. Reznicek's score contains sustained passages for the tuba that require more breath continuously poured into the instrument than even so robust a virtuoso as Mr. Mattersteig could confidently summon. It is precisely this need of breath that the aerophor is designed to meet; he used it accordingly and he found it efficient for its purpose.

As Mr. Samuels himself describes the aerophor, it is designed to enable any player upon a wind instrument to sustain its tone indefinitely, beyond the compass of his lungs or while he is resting them and otherwise regaining the nervous energy that the composer is exhausting in him. It enables the composer in turn to write as many and as long sustained passages for his wind choir as he chooses, to be generally more exacting with them and to attain new ranges of tonal tints. As the illustrations above show, the mechanism consists of a small bellows, placed on the floor beside the player's chair and pressed and released by his foot. A flexible rubber tube connects the bellows with the instrument and ends in a metal reed fastened near the mouthpiece of clarinet or tuba. The player takes both the mouthpiece of the tube and the mouthpiece of his instrument between his lips. Through the tube, by the pressure of his foot upon the bellows, air is slowly pumped into his mouth, while he is breathing for himself through his nose.

Now, without the aerophor the player must breathe through his mouth, as he has done since the earliest days of wind instruments in orchestras, because it is a physical impossibility to emit air from the mouth into an instrument and receive it at the same time through the nose. Hence arise the necessity of "breath-pauses" for the players and the consequent limitation of their power in sustained passages for them. With the aerophor, so long as the virtuoso keeps his lips in their due position on the mouthpiece of his instrument—a detail of muscular control easily acquired—the air pumped through the tube and entering his instrument through his mouth sustains his tone until he has gained his own new resources of breath. This air, moreover, is warmed and moistened, if need be, by passing through a little compartment—the rectangle at the back of the bellows—which contains an ounce of water, heated by a tiny electric lamp ignited from the wire readily and familiarly attached to any music-stand. Thus the aerophor gives the amplest means to the players of wind instruments for indefinitely sustained passages and new range in duration and in color to the composers writing them.



(From the Yellow Book)

[illegible] Suggestion to Reznicek

POST, SATURDAY,

MAY 2, 1914

SYMPHONY GIVES LAST REHEARSAL

Saint-Saens' 'Modern' Classic Is Performed

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last public rehearsal of the 33d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of the C minor symphony of Saint-Saens, with organ and piano as well as a considerable equipment of orchestral instruments; the third Brandenburg concerto of J. S. Bach for three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and bass, and with a part for harpsichord represented yesterday afternoon by Mr. de Voto at the piano; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus" and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

DEADLY CLASSICAL

The symphony of Saint-Saens was written by the composer with a certain deliberate intention of showing the world that Saint-Saens, too, could instrumentate in the modern manner. Perhaps the composer was stirred to this step by the younger set in Paris who were already beginning to make fun of him for his conservatism in 1886. At any rate he made what amounted to a formal statement of his decision "that the time has come for the symphony to benefit by the progress of modern instrumentation," and he used three flutes, a bass clarinet, a double bassoon, an organ and a pianoforte for two or four hands—an array of instruments which, added to the usual quota employed, would seem modest, perhaps, to a Strauss or Mahler, but which constitute an ensemble which Saint-Saens employs with exceptional clearness and mastery of style. But alas for the dreams of the composer! This is no modern symphony. It is as deadly classical in its essential character as anything that the fluent Mr. Saint-Saens ever composed.

Undoubtedly the performance of this symphony and of later works on the programme were brilliant, although Dr. Muck's very rapid tempi for the Meistersinger prelude are certainly open to discussion, and the performance of this prelude, as a whole, was less euphonious, less continuous and more episodic in its character, than other performances we have heard of the work and performances under the same leader.

15 Novelties Heard

A word about the programmes. Fifteen novelties have been heard during the season past. Of these Ravel's "La Mere L'Oye," Debussy's "Printemps"—a youthful and charming composition—Florent Schmidtt's "La Tragedie de Salome," and the "Fourth Symphony" of Sibelius, were undoubtedly worthy of the pains extended upon their production. Many thought the same of Reznicek's "symphonic biography," "Schlemihl." It is hard to see why, even though a composer can write in two keys at once, employ the instruments and the cheaper mannerisms of a Strauss and incorporate "Ach du Lieber Augustine" in his work. The symphonies by Clapp and Urack were emphatically not worth while, even though it were a kind deed on the part of Dr. Muck to give these young men a chance. The less chances of this kind taken, the better, we think, for the symphony programmes.

The programmes have been as a whole better balanced and more inclusive than those of the preceding year. Yet it may be said that symphony audiences have a right to expect more Strauss, for instance, then Dr. Muck has given. Strauss has composed much more than his early "Death and Transfiguration." The "Zarathustra," the "Don Quixote," the "Heldenleben," even the "MacBeth" and "Don Juan," and the Domestic Symphony are now standard works, for which there is a large and enthusiastic public.

Recognition of Sibelius

Sibelius, who is also coming rapidly into his own, could well have been more fully represented. His second symphony, his "Saga," his "Varsang," and a work not yet heard here, the "Nightride and Sunrise" are among pieces which should be made familiar. D'Indy's symphony "A Day on a Mountain," was given. We can hope for more of D'Indy next winter.

The B-flat symphony, the "Istar" variations, the symphony on a "Mountain Air," are among his works, and other composers of the modern French school might well be given more frequent hearing. Chausson has written a great symphony. Ravel, Dukas, Chabrier and others have produced compositions of interest and merit. Henry F. Gilbert is a composer of singular talent and individuality. And there are Russian composers whom we are curious to know, such as Stravinsky, Liadoff, Scriabine, Gliere, Ippolitoff-Ivanov. Certainly it is difficult to satisfy the tastes of every member of a symphony audience in an American city, but we believe that the programmes given here could have been more inclusive and more cognizant of the achievements of present day composers.

At the close of the concert there was enthusiastic applause of the conductor, who has led so many great performances in the course of the season, performances which have added to the fame of this orchestra.

berg, of Scriabin and of Stravin-

ADVERTISER,

MAY 2, 1914

SYMPHONY SEASON COMES TO A CLOSE

FINAL PROGRAMME OF GREAT ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

Audience Applauds Both Orchestra and Director After "Meistersinger" Prelude Ends Concert.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

St. Saens	Third Symphony. C minor
Bach	Brandenburg Concerto
Beethoven	"Coriolanus" overture
Wagner	Prelude to "The Meistersinger"

A great and purely orchestral programme, with not a trace of the musical Cubist school, the modern figure- juggling, in it from first to last. It began grandly with the great symphony which St. Saens dedicated to the memory of Franz Liszt. This work is practically new to Boston. It was heard once, during the visit of the composer to Boston, but not in the regular symphonic series. Mr. Gericke intended to bring out the work, in the old Music Hall days, but found the little organ, which was there, inadequate.

In this work both piano and organ are introduced as tone-colors, and the scoring is vast although not so novel as one finds in Reznicek, or Lendvai, or Strauss. The symphony shows St. Saens at his best, a leader in the true classical school. Yet he has modernized the symphonic form and does not slavishly or pedantically follow the strict shape. He unites his first two and last two movements, so that the work is in two sections only; he does not make the regular recapitulation of themes, in the first movement, although he obtains the spirit of the sonata-allegro by causing reminiscences of the themes to appear and these form an impressive transition to the Adagio, in which the organ plays a prominent part, giving a sacred character and a celestial ending which suit admirably to the "In Memoriam" character of the composition. This is especially noticeable in the Finale.

Although St. Saens in his figure-treatment does not squeeze the very last drop out of his lemon before he leave his topic, yet he is a fine master of true development, and the figure-treatment of the first movement is both ingenious and impressive. That is the Beethoven idea of development. That master once said that development was not to be mere skill of treatment of a figure, but was to reveal its true meaning, its soul. The figures are foreshadowed even in the introduction, and the figure of the chief theme is overlapped into the subordinate theme, somewhat in the manner that Beethoven overlaps his two subjects in the first movement of his fifth symphony.

In the next movement the piano enters. It is possible that the composer wished to emphasize his tribute to Liszt by using his especial instrument in the work. But the piano is not very prominent, not nearly so much so as the organ. It is employed as an absolute tone-color, and not as a solo or even an obbligato instrument. At one point, for example, it is joined to certain scales upon the piccolo, and the usual combination is very striking and effective. We know of no symphonic work where so good an orchestral tone-color is obtained from the instrument. It was very discreetly and effectively played by Mr. Alfred De Voto.

In the second section also there is much figure treatment. One figure of tonic and dominant is tossed from violins and violas (unison) to the kettledrums in a very quaint manner. The violin-viola theme is subsequently developed at somewhat too great a length, yet there is sustained interest in the constantly changing rhythms, 6-8, 9-8, then suddenly appearing as a march (2-2) and finally a triple rhythm (3-1), for one can follow it in all its metamorphoses; it is never ugly and never too complicated. The clashes of cymbals serve to accent some of the changes of the figure and relieve it of too much complexity.

In the finale the organ again blends with the orchestra in a most noble climax, a triumph and apotheosis, and there is also some classical fugal work. Here is a symphony that is quite as developed as the ultra-modern school, a work which is almost as heavily scored as the symphony of Mr. Clapp, yet is beautiful, lofty and inspiring. It was played in a superb manner, Dr. Muck reading it in a style that was most commendable. Mr. Marshall's organ playing was very effective. The applause at the end was most

A walk in the corridor and then a decided contrast. From one of the mighty modern scores we were led back to a primitive Bach score in chamber-music style. And it proved that one school of music does not abolish another, any more than Swinburne abolished Wordsworth. The Bach concerto was, to be sure, somewhat magnified. The orchestra was increased from a chamber-music band to a magnificent modern organization of strings; and the periwigged clavecinist with the clavi-cembalo was increased to Mr. De Voto at a grand piano; but the glorious counterpoint remained the same, and if the work might have seemed too forcible to an 18th century auditor, it was not at all so to 19th century ears.

Then came a lesson (in the "Coriolanus" overture) as to how dramatic one can be even with conservative forces. Strauss's "Heldenleben" with all its orchestral forces is not so heroic as this picture of the mythical Roman general. The noble contrast of the chief theme, the warrior, with the tender subordinate theme (the wife and mother), the stern figure which portrays Fate, the gradual augmentation of the warrior figure, its hesitant weakness, the suggestion of the death of Coriolanus, all make a picture that is equal to anything that the later strivers can accomplish with their entire tonal armies. The music is not inspired by Shakespeare's "Coriolanus," but by the less-known play by Collin, and it pictures the tragedy with great fidelity.

Of course the great "Meistersinger" Prelude made a grandiose ending to the concert and the season, and equally, of course, the public thanked Dr. Muck and the orchestra for what they had done in these last six months, with the most earnest and long-continued applause. There is more real musical enjoyment in a fine symphony concert than in an opera, and Boston evidently appreciates what treasures it owns in such an orchestra and such a director, the final plaudits being palpably directed at each of these.

BOSTON JOURNAL

MAY 2, 1914

FINAL SYMPHONY MATINEE EXCITING

Two Ovations and Numerous "Votes for Women" Buttons Noted.

Two ovations, one after the first number and the other at the close of the concert, marked the final Symphony matinee yesterday. The occasion was also remarkable for the large number of "Votes for Women" buttons worn by many of the women present, especially the younger ones.

The program presented by Dr. Muck was one of the most attractive of the season; the performance throughout was of the virtuoso caliber that always distinguishes the Symphony Orchestra when conductor and players are in their best form; and before the first number, the Saint-Saens symphony in C minor, was half over, the audience began to show evidences of an enthusiastic mood.

The Saint-Saens work is essentially melodious; it is scored by a master hand, and it has rousing climaxes. When such a composition is brilliantly performed, as was the case yesterday, popular enthusiasm is bound to show itself. Dr. Muck first conducted the work during his initial season in Boston, over seven years ago, when the composer was present; and as it had not been heard since then it partook of the nature of a novelty to many of the music-lovers in the audience yesterday. A quasi-ecclesiastical atmosphere is emphasized by the prominence taken by the organ, which was played yesterday by Professor John P. Marshall. The piano parts were played by Alfred De Voto and Rudolph Nagel.

Mr. De Voto also sat at the piano during the performance of Bach's third "Bradenburg Concerto," a work chiefly for string orchestra. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which Wagner describes as a tone picture of the tragic scene in the Volscian camp, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" completed the program.

The audience remained, at the conclusion of the Wagner number, to applaud until the orchestra rose and Concert Master Witek had received Dr. Muck's compliments in the form of a vigorous handshake.

The final concert of the season, with the same program, will take place tonight. There will be no formalities in public, but Maj. Higginson will make his customary address of congratulations to the orchestra in private and wish the members a pleasant summer.

BOSTON GLOBE

MAY 2. 1914.

SYMPHONY FAREWELL.

Special Tribute to Dr Muck and Players.

Saint-Saens' Third Symphony Played, Mastersingers' Prelude to Close.

The 24th and final rehearsal yesterday afternoon and the concert tonight will bring to a close the 33d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Friday afternoon audience took leave of Dr Muck and the players after applause at the close of the concert which twice brought the conductor back to the platform, caused him to invite the men to rise with him, the second time during the concert, and finally to shake Mr Witek's hand as a representative expression of his appreciation also of the orchestra. It was good to see the usual rush for the street stayed for a few moments of friendly and grateful leave-taking.

The symphony was Saint-Saens' third in C minor. His dedication of it to Liszt was a sign of deep gratitude of years' standing. Liszt had used his influence to bring about the first production of "Samson and Delilah" at Weimar, and that after a new opera of Saint-Saens had gone badly in Paris. His letters show the warm regard in which he held Saint-Saens, the pleasure with which he heard of his welfare or the success of his works. Speaking of a suite of Saint-Saens to be performed at a certain concert, Liszt wrote in a letter to Riedel (May, 1874) "Among modern composers I regard Saint-Saens as the ablest and most gifted."

Again, in sending his piano transcription of the "Danse Macabre," Liszt deprecates his "unskillfulness in reducing such marvelous coloring of the score to the possibilities of the piano." More pertinent, in view of the use of the organ in this symphony, are Liszt's words to the composer in praise of his arrangement for the organ of his own "St Francis Preaching to the Birds": "You use your organ in an incredible way. The most proficient organists in all countries have only to take off their hats to you."

The clarity of scoring, the elegance in design, the nice grouping of materials, the polished workmanship of this symphony, are its chief characteristics. The invention is graceful, but not lofty or inspired. The thoughts are not of great intrinsic beauty or value, but they are dressed and set off in a manner that delights the ear. Saint-Saens had an agreeable style in development. He explored pleasurably the resources of an idea, brought it back in this or that guise, in a new variant or key, or instrument, but did not pursue it ruthlessly for vivisection.

Here, as in "Samson and Delilah," his treatment of accompanying figures is of a dramatic character. He was apt in gaining emotional effects through simple but cleverly introduced modulation, as the mystical vein in the slow movement with organ, as the impressive hush about the chords of the instrument alone. If there is emptiness and disappointment in the attempt at epic writing in the final movement, where Cesar Franck would have made something more of the chanting brass, there is a facility and grace of workmanship, a luminous transparency of style and an appreciative sense of the orchestra, particularly of his wood wind and of the organ, that make the two sections grouped as the first movement worthy of admiration.

Bach's Brandenburg concerto, written for a bass and a trio each of violins, violas and cellos, was played by all the strings. There was splendid regard for its wholesome rigor, yet without impairing the precision of its contrapuntal figuration, which naturally would be sensed with more intimacy in a smaller orchestra. Sturdy music of unimpeachable integrity, good for hearing in these days of revolutionary striving.

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" brought the concert to a majestic and triumphal close, conducted and played in a fine dramatic vein. May Dr Muck's Summer be a pleasant one.

BOSTON HERALD

MAY 2. 1914.

LAST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL OF 33D SEASON

Saint-Saens's Symphony in C Minor Production of Consummate Skill.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. This was the last public rehearsal of the 33d season. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 3	Saint-Saens
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3	Bach
Overture to "Coriolanus"	Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"	Wagner

There is little to be said about thr of the compositions, for the two ove tures are familiar and the music o Bach in either movement might have been shortened or lengthened as far as the formulas were concerned. Bach in English means "brook" and the composer in his contrapuntal industry, too often, like Tennyson's brook, went on forever. Nor is it necessary to dilate upon the orchestral performance throughout, which in every way was admirable.

A review of the season, which might be expected here, will be found in another section of today's Herald. It is enough to say that the season has been a brilliant one by reason of the great technical proficiency of the orchestra and the rare qualities of Dr. Muck as disciplinarian and interpreter. We are now so acquainted with remarkable performances at these concerts that perhaps we take too much for granted, yet Dr. Muck should know that he is thoroughly appreciated and held in high honor in this city.

It is now almost impossible to think of this orchestra without him as the vivifying and ruling spirit. May his summer be a pleasant one! We do not say restful, for his nature rebels against inaction. A change of scene, with a change in work is to him true rest.

The symphony of Saint-Saens might tempt one to write a long article about the symphonic art in the France of later years and about recent utterances of Saint-Saens concerning the art he has so honored.

The symphony in C minor, composed for the Philharmonic Society of London, was produced in London 28 years ago next month. Cesar Franck's symphony was composed in 1886-88. Vincent d'Indy's first symphony was composed in 1886, his second one in B flat in 1902-03.

Saint-Saens is now accused of being a conservative, even a reactionary. The ultra-modern youngsters in Paris irreverently speak of his music as "old hat," and class him unjustly with "Monsieur Massenet," who, by the way, was a musician of indisputable talent with an uncommon melodic gift. There is no knowing what Massenet might not have accomplished if he had not devoted the best years of his life to the opera house, chiefly anxious to please the public.

Yet Saint-Saens was for many years accused of being "too German" and looked upon as an innovator worshipping strange gods. Call him an eclectic if you will, say that he has no physiognomy of his own—for this is said, although it is not true; the fact remains that, by his attention to orchestral and chamber music when these branches of art were neglected in France, except by Lalo and a few of his friends, he paved the way for Cesar Franck, D'Indy, Debussy and others of the more modern school.

Unfortunately for his reputation as a critic, Saint-Saens has written ironically concerning achievements and tendencies of this school. He has a pretty wit which often bites. Take, for example, his article on musical anarchy in "Ecole Buissonniere," published last year. He quotes from some writer who asserts that there should be unlimited freedom in music: that there are no perfect chords, no dissonant chords, no false chords; that every aggregation of notes is legitimate; that this is the development of musical sensitiveness.

Now hear Saint-Saens: "Thus he whose sensitiveness is developed, is not he who, tasting wine, can tell you the vineyard and the year; it is he that swallows indifferently a well-bodied wine, swipes, cognac or whiskey, and prefers that which scratches deepest his gullet. It is not be that puts delicate strokes on the canvas, whose tones have a reciprocal value, but he that brutally puts vermilion and Veronese green side by side, as may be seen at the Salon d' Automne. It is not he that knows, in passing ingeniously from one tonality to another, to give them new and unexpected aspects, as the great Richard has been able to do in the whole score of 'The Mastersingers'; it is he that, avoiding any tonality, huddling together without intermission dissonances never prepared, never resolved, snorts his way through music like a wild boar in a garden blooming with flowers."

But when Saint-Saens composed the symphony in C minor he sought to shun "interminable repetitions," and thought, to use his own words, that the time had come for the symphony to benefit by the progress of modern instrumentation. He therefore introduced the English horn, the bass clarinet, the tuba, an organ, piano, bass drum, cymbals. Schumann had used the triangle before him. We do not go back to Beethoven's Ninth; there was an outcry against Franck in Paris for admitting an English horn in the orchestra for his symphony.

Saint-Saens's symphony in C minor has the finest and most characteristic qualities of the best French music: logical construction, lucidity, frankness, euphony. The workmanship is masterly. There is no hesitation. The composer knew exactly what he wanted and how to express himself. A few of the themes that when first exposed might seem to some insignificant assume importance and even grandeur in the development. The chief theme of the Adagio, the theme for strings, is very French in its sustained suavity, in a gentle emotional quality that never loses elegance, and the preparation for the entrance of this Adagio is worthy of the greatest masters. It is not necessary to speak of the many beautiful or stirring pages; of the consummate skill of the technician; of the unerring instrumentation. The symphony will be played tonight; the music will again speak for itself.

Young composers can learn from this work the value of simplicity and economy in the use of orchestral resources. Far better for them to study this score and the scores of Saint-Saens's symphonic poems than to spend laborious nights over the later works of Richard Strauss. Strauss began by studying diligently the classics. The young now begin with the "Domestic" symphony or "Salome."

A walk in the corridor and then a decided contrast. From one of the mighty modern scores we were led back to a primitive Bach score in chamber-music style. And it proved that one school of music does not abolish another, any more than Swinburne abolished Wordsworth. The Bach concerto was, to be sure, somewhat magnified. The orchestra was increased from a chamber-music band to a magnificent modern organization of strings; and the periwigged clavecinist with the clavi-cembalo was increased to Mr. De Voto at a grand piano; but the glorious counterpoint remained the same, and if the work might have seemed too forcible to an 18th century auditor, it was not at all so to 19th century ears.

Then came a lesson (in the "Coriolanus" overture) as to how dramatic one can be even with conservative forces. Strauss's "Heldenleben" with all its orchestral forces is not so heroic as this picture of the mythical Roman general. The noble contrast of the chief theme, the warrior, with the tender subordinate theme (the wife and mother), the stern figure which portrays Fate, the gradual augmentation of the warrior figure, its hesitant weakness, the suggestion of the death of Coriolanus, all make a picture that is equal to anything that the later strivers can accomplish with their entire tonal armies. The music is not inspired by Shakespeare's "Coriolanus," but by the less-known play by Collin, and it pictures the tragedy with great fidelity.

Of course the great "Meistersinger" Prelude made a grandiose ending to the concert and the season, and equally, of course, the public thanked Dr. Muck and the orchestra for what they had done in these last six months, with the most earnest and long-continued applause. There is more real musical enjoyment in a fine symphony concert than in an opera, and Boston evidently appreciates what treasures it owns in such an orchestra and such a director, the final plaudits being palpably directed at each of these.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
MAY 2. 1914

FINAL SYMPHONY MATINEE EXCITING

Two Ovations and Numerous "Votes for Women" Buttons Noted.

Two ovations, one after the first number and the other at the close of the concert, marked the final Symphony matinee yesterday. The occasion was also remarkable for the large number of "Votes for Women" buttons worn by many of the women present, especially the younger ones.

The program presented by Dr. Muck was one of the most attractive of the season; the performance throughout was of the virtuoso caliber that always distinguishes the Symphony Orchestra when conductor and players are in their best form; and before the first number, the Saint-Saens symphony in C minor, was half over, the audience began to show evidences of an enthusiastic mood.

The Saint-Saens work is essentially melodious; it is scored by a master hand, and it has rousing climaxes. When such a composition is brilliantly performed, as was the case yesterday, popular enthusiasm is bound to show itself. Dr. Muck first conducted the work during his initial season in Boston, over seven years ago, when the composer was present; and as it had not been heard since then it partook of the nature of a novelty to many of the music-lovers in the audience yesterday. A quasi-ecclesiastical atmosphere is emphasized by the prominence taken by the organ, which was played yesterday by Professor John P. Marshall. The piano parts were played by Alfred De Voto and Rudolph Nagel.

Mr. De Voto also sat at the piano during the performance of Bach's third "Bradenburg Concerto," a work chiefly for string orchestra. Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, which Wagner describes as a tone picture of the tragic scene in the Volscian camp, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" completed the program.

The audience remained, at the conclusion of the Wagner number, to applaud until the orchestra rose and Concert Master Witek had received Dr. Muck's compliments in the form of a vigorous handshake.

The final concert of the season, with the same program, will take place tonight. There will be no formalities in public, but Maj. Higginson will make his customary address of congratulations to the orchestra in private and wish the members a pleasant summer.

BOSTON GLOBE—

MAY 2. 1914.

SYMPHONY FAREWELL.

Special Tribute to Dr Muck and Players.

Saint-Saens' Third Symphony Played, Mastersingers' Prelude to Close.

The 24th and final rehearsal yesterday afternoon and the concert tonight will bring to a close the 33d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Friday afternoon audience took leave of Dr Muck and the players after applause at the close of the concert which twice brought the conductor back to the platform, caused him to invite the men to rise with him, the second time during the concert, and finally to shake Mr Witek's hand as a representative expression of his appreciation also of the orchestra. It was good to see the usual rush for the street stayed for a few moments of friendly and grateful leave-taking.

The symphony was Saint-Saens' third in C minor. His dedication of it to Liszt was a sign of deep gratitude of years' standing. Liszt had used his influence to bring about the first production of "Samson and Delilah" at Weimar, and that after a new opera of Saint-Saens had gone badly in Paris. His letters show the warm regard in which he held Saint-Saens, the pleasure with which he heard of his welfare or the success of his works. Speaking of a suite of Saint-Saens to be performed at a certain concert, Liszt wrote in a letter to Riedel (May, 1874) "Among modern composers I regard Saint-Saens as the ablest and most gifted.")

Again, in sending his piano transcription of the "Danse Macabre," Liszt deprecates his "unskillfulness in reducing such marvelous coloring of the score to the possibilities of the piano." More pertinent, in view of the use of the organ in this symphony, are Liszt's words to the composer in praise of his arrangement for the organ of his own "St Francis Preaching to the Birds": "You use your organ in an incredible way. The most proficient organists in all countries have only to take off their hats to you."

The clarity of scoring, the elegance in design, the nice grouping of materials, the polished workmanship of this symphony, are its chief characteristics. The invention is graceful, but not lofty or inspired. The thoughts are not of great intrinsic beauty or value, but they are dressed and set off in a manner that delights the ear. Saint-Saens had an agreeable style in development. He explored pleasurably the resources of an idea, brought it back in this or that guise, in a new variant or key, or instrument, but did not pursue it ruthlessly for vivisection.

Here, as in "Samson and Delilah," his treatment of accompanying figures is of a dramatic character. He was apt in gaining emotional effects through simple but cleverly introduced modulation, as the mystical vein in the slow movement with organ, as the impressive hush about the chords of the instrument alone. If there is emptiness and disappointment in the attempt at epic writing in the final movement, where Cesar Franck would have made something more of the chanting brass, there is a facility and grace of workmanship, a luminous transparency of style and an appreciative sense of the orchestra, particularly of his wood wind and of the organ, that make the two sections grouped as the first movement worthy of admiration.

Bach's Brandenburg concerto, written for a bass and a trio each of violins, violas and cellos, was played by all the strings. There was splendid regard for its wholesome rigor, yet without impairing the precision of its contrapuntal figuration, which naturally would be sensed with more intimacy in a smaller orchestra. Sturdy music of unimpeachable integrity, good for hearing in these days of revolutionary striving.

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and the prelude to "The Mastersingers" brought the concert to a majestic and triumphal close, conducted and played in a fine dramatic vein. May Dr Muck's Summer be a pleasant one.

BOSTON HERALD.

MAY 2. 1914.

LAST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL OF 33D SEASON

Saint-Saens's Symphony in C Minor Production of Consummate Skill.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. This was the last public rehearsal of the 33d season. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 3......Saint-Saens
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3.............Bach
Overture to "Coriolanus"...........Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".......Wagner

There is little to be said about three of the compositions, for the two overtures are familiar and the music of Bach in either movement might have been shortened or lengthened as far as the formulas were concerned. Bach in English means "brook" and the composer in his contrapuntal industry, too often, like Tennyson's brook, went on forever. Nor is it necessary to dilate upon the orchestral performance throughout, which in every way was admirable.

A review of the season, which might be expected here, will be found in another section of today's Herald. It is enough to say that the season has been a brilliant one by reason of the great technical proficiency of the orchestra and the rare qualities of Dr. Muck as disciplinarian and interpreter. We are now so acquainted with remarkable performances at these concerts that perhaps we take too much for granted, yet Dr. Muck should know that he is thoroughly appreciated and held in high honor in this city.

It is now almost impossible to think of this orchestra without him as the vivifying and ruling spirit. May his summer be a pleasant one! We do not say restful, for his nature rebels against inaction. A change of scene, with a change in work is to him true rest.

The symphony of Saint-Saens might tempt one to write a long article about the symphonic art in the France of later years and about recent utterances of Saint-Saens concerning the art he has so honored.

The symphony in C minor, composed for the Philharmonic Society of London, was produced in London 28 years ago next month. Cesar Franck's symphony was composed in 1886-88. Vincent d'Indy's first symphony was composed in 1886, his second one in B flat in 1902-03.

Saint-Saens is now accused of being a conservative, even a reactionary. The ultra-modern youngsters in Paris irreverently speak of his music as "old hat," and class him unjustly with "Monsieur Massenet," who, by the way, was a musician of indisputable talent with an uncommon melodic gift. There is no knowing what Massenet might not have accomplished if he had not devoted the best years of his life to the opera house, chiefly anxious to please the public.

Yet Saint-Saens was for many years accused of being "too German" and looked upon as an innovator worshipping strange gods. Call him an eclectic if you will, say that he has no physiognomy of his own—for this is said, although it is not true; the fact remains that, by his attention to orchestral and chamber music when these branches of art were neglected in France, except by Lalo and a few of his friends, he paved the way for Cesar Franck, D'Indy, Debussy and others of the more modern school.

Unfortunately for his reputation as a critic, Saint-Saens has written ironically concerning achievements and tendencies of this school. He has a pretty wit which often bites. Take, for example, his article on musical anarchy in "Ecole Buissonniere," published last year. He quotes from some writer who asserts that there should be unlimited freedom in music: that there are no perfect chords, no dissonant chords, no false chords; that every aggregation of notes is legitimate; that this is the development of musical sensitiveness.

Now hear Saint-Saens: "Thus he whose sensitiveness is developed, is not he who, tasting wine, can tell you the vineyard and the year; it is he that swallows indifferently a well-bodied wine, swipes, cognac or whiskey, and prefers that which scratches deepest his gullet. It is not be that puts delicate strokes on the canvas, whose tones have a reciprocal value, but he that brutally puts vermilion and Veronese green side by side, as may be seen at the Salon d' Automne. It is not he that knows, in passing ingeniously from one tonality to another, to give them new and unexpected aspects, as the great Richard has been able to do in the whole score of 'The Mastersingers'; it is he that, avoiding any tonality, huddling together without intermission dissonances never prepared, never resolved, snorts his way through music like a wild boar in a garden blooming with flowers."

But when Saint-Saens composed the symphony in C minor he sought to shun "interminable repetitions," and thought, to use his own words, that the time had come for the symphony to benefit by the progress of modern instrumentation. He therefore introduced the English horn, the bass clarinet, the tuba, an organ, piano, bass drum, cymbals. Schumann had used the triangle before him. We do not go back to Beethoven's Ninth; there was an outcry against Franck in Paris for admitting an English horn in the orchestra for his symphony.

Saint-Saens's symphony in C minor has the finest and most characteristic qualities of the best French music: logical construction, lucidity, frankness, euphony. The workmanship is masterly. There is no hesitation. The composer knew exactly what he wanted and how to express himself. A few of the themes that when first exposed might seem to some insignificant assume importance and even grandeur in the development. The chief theme of the Adagio, the theme for strings, is very French in its sustained suavity, in a gentle emotional quality that never loses elegance, and the preparation for the entrance of this Adagio is worthy of the greatest masters. It is not necessary to speak of the many beautiful or stirring pages; of the consummate skill of the technician; of the unerring instrumentation. The symphony will be played tonight; the music will again speak for itself.

Young composers can learn from this work the value of simplicity and economy in the use of orchestral resources. Far better for them to study this score and the scores of Saint-Saens's symphonic poems than to spend laborious nights over the later works of Richard Strauss. Strauss began by studying diligently the classics. The young now begin with the "Domestic" symphony or "Salome."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1914

Surveying Symphony Standards

For Another Year Dr. Muck and the Orchestra Maintain and Heighten Them

By H. T. P.

AT the end, today, of the thirty-third season, the Symphony Concerts may fairly be counted an institution; yet thus far they have escaped the fate that overtakes most established things—content and consequent inertia. They owe this good fortune less to the audiences, which for years past have taken their distinctions for granted, than to the zeal, the ambition and the standards of the successive conductors, the management that has endured since the beginnings of the band and the men in the orchestra itself. Once and again the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening may grumble at the ordering of the programmes, at the quality of the "assisting artists," at the interest and the worth of the novel pieces, because it is human nature in a regular public so to do. Yet next to never, especially since the return of Dr. Muck, does it reproach the standards of performance. Week after week, through seven months of the year, it hears an orchestra unequalled in America and unexcelled in Europe—an orchestra that makes a remarkable virtuosity the means to as signal and varied an eloquence. It listens to the brightness, the elasticity and the manifold energy of the violins, to the deeper sonorities of the darker strings; to the suavity, the sensibility and the fine intensities of the wood-wind choir; to the glowing tone of the horns and the trumpets, to the richness of the graver brass; to the euphony and the balance of the whole band; to its sweeps of power and its recurring miracles of finesse; to its susceptibility not only to the gradual march of a progression but to very moulding of a phrase; to its sense of individuality and style in its music flowering in as multifold expressive power as that of the composers whose voice a hundred times a year it becomes.

The Work Behind

The public listens to all these things and takes them for granted, beyond a recall or two for the conductor and maybe sufficient applause for him to bring the band to its feet. At most, it believes that they are the results of rehearsals of which, if the truth were told, it has only a vague notion. Presumably the conductor studies his scores; but he happens also to spend weeks in assiduous preliminary preparation of them and to give his days and his nights to them when he has them immediately in hand for performance. Presumably, he rehearses the orchestra; but he happens also to take the several choirs and spend hours in the practising of each. Presumably the men spare no diligence in these rehearsals; but they have been known to exercise themselves in their parts at home. Finally, the conductor, like the trainer of an eleven or a nine, must bring his orchestra to the days of public performance, exactly "on edge," not once or twice in a year, but here in Boston forty-eight times from the middle of October to ammel

e beginning of May. As often and as urely, he must be "on edge" himself to ecome the transmitting medium of the music, comprehending it, imagining it, eeling it and so individualizing it in its wn image, devising his means of pace nd rhythm, contrast, transition and imax, euphony and proportion, outline nd color, light, shade and accent, and ually ready to impose his ordering and mulating will upon the orchestra and his mmunicating nervous force upon the auence. Weekly Dr. Muck and his men y this task upon themselves; weekly ey accomplish it; and weekly their hears take all for granted.

he Standard of Performance

To do so is one of the standards of e Symphony Concerts that conductors d orchestra have long maintained. The ans are not merely the individual virtuty of the men, their sense of beauty of e and expressive quality of phrase, r musical intelligence or their regard euphony and proportion. It lies much e in the [illegible] that each one of them is a releasing and revealing voice in the music and an essential factor in the perfection of performance that is the goal. It is said of the orchestra at the Opera House in Dresden that each man plays as though he were an actor in the music-drama on the stage. It is as true that each man in the Symphony Orchestra plays as though he were the understanding, the feeling and the disclosing voice of the music. Because largely of the influence of Dr. Muck upon them, these voices, busy as they usually are with purely symphonic music, are now becoming as operatic voices when they must speak out in the prelude to a music-drama or the accompaniment of an air. And the most potent voice, though of itself it utter not a sound, the voice of which all the others are more or less an echo, is that of the conductor himself.

In Dr. Muck, it is the penetrating, insinuating, stimulating and commanding voice that has carried the orchestra in these last two years to an eloquence of performance never gained before. He has held and heightened the orchestra in its technical range and perfection until there is no feat of virtuosity, however fleet, exacting or subtle, that it cannot do. He has schooled it to a sensuous beauty of tone that ranges from an exquisite finesse to a glowing splendor. He has taught it to phrase the song of its instruments as though they were human voices with the keenest of musical sensibility directing them. He has made rhythm as second nature to it, and just accent as instinctive impulse. These have been his means. His end has been the transmission through himself and his men of the music in its intrinsic quality and its individual life. To each piece, whether Mozart wrote it in his idiom or Florent Schmitt in his, its particular voice, style and eloquence. With each piece, the new vitalizing as though it were springing afresh out of itself; the clear unfolding in shrewd and sympathetic comprehension; the warm imagining that divines beauty and sets free power; the transmitting splendor or subtlety; the sense of orchestral song and of harmonic and instrumental vesture; the feeling for disembodied sound woven in lovely pattern or for puissant proclamation of human image and emotion. Of such, in music that has ranged far and wide, has been Dr. Muck's conducting. "He that loseth his life shall find it." Surrendering himself to his music and his work, Dr. Muck has gained the greater individual glory. He stands in the first rank of the conductors of our time. He has excelled all his predecessors with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck Conducting

From a Hitherto Unpublished Portrait Made in the Royal Opera House in Berlin

The Standard of Repertory

Side by [illegible] with the standard of performa[illegible] the Symphony Concerts mar[illegible] standard of the programmes [illegible]

For ten years, whatever the individual idiosyncrasies of the conductor in the making of each one, they have been models of catholicity. Through twenty-four of them he may range, and now with the gradual lengthening of the concerts—a happy change from an ancient and unambitious routine—he may have as many of them as he chooses nearly two hours long. Last season when Dr. Muck was restoring the orchestra to its perfections as an instrument and picking not a few of his pieces accordingly he was not too severely to be put to the test with his programmes. This season there has been no need for such allowances, and his choice of music may be fairly tried by the highest standards of the concerts. Certainly he has given the early masters their due, and the Mozart of minor pieces a little more. Certainly he has not neglected the elder classics, like Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, and he has been uncommonly kind to Mendelssohn. The composers whose music has become classic in our own time, like Brahms, Liszt, Franck, Wagner—so far as he is possible in concerts—and Tschaikowsky, have had a fair inning. The intermediate Bruckner and the belatedly risen Mahler have each had his symphony. Established contemporary composers, like Debussy, Dukas, d'Indy, Rachmanioff, Loeffler, Strauss and Sibelius, have all been represented. The secondary writers of contemporary music—Juon, Enesco and Humperdinck, for example—have not been overlooked. Rising men, like Ravel, Schmitt and Reznicek, have been discovered or recognized. Young American composers have had their due—and rather more—in Mr. Clapps's symphony and Mr. Rubin Goldmark's tone-poem. Of the wholly novel pieces, few have been uninteresting in themselves, and none has lacked some title—even if it had to be stretched a little, as with Mr. Urack's symphony—to performance. Almost all of the revivals of long-overlooked or carelessly neglected music have justified themselves. A list of ninety-two pieces—the soloists' numbers included—from fifty-three composers speaks for Dr. Muck's catholicity.

The Triple Sin of Omission

Yet with all this breadth and variety, with all this freedom from personal idiosyncrasy and prejudice, there are omissions in the list more significant than that of any of the later tone-poems of Strauss now unheard here for two seasons, of any music by Reger or of any by the singular and little known Delius, or by such rising Parisians as Ducasse and Casella or by the unrecognized but deserving Italian symphonist, Scontrino. From London even to St. Petersburg, from Berlin as far as Milan, the music of three innovating men is played and debated up and down Europe—of Schönberg, of Scriabin and of Stravinsky. By the printed word and by the report [illegible] who have heard it with their own ears, the fame of it has been spread abroad on this side of the Atlantic. Yet the public of the Symphony Concerts—accounted the most intelligent and open-minded public for music in America—has heard not a measure written by these three conspicuous and disputed men, except only an insignificant piece by Scriabin in Mr. Fiedler's time.

It is quite true that all three depart from many an accepted procedure and that many ears hear their music resentfully and contemptuously. Some listeners will not admit that it is music at all. But the bitterest of these detractors at least hear it. We in Boston do not. To as many more hearers, the music of Schönberg, Stravinsky and Scriabin has proved interesting, stimulating, exciting, as though it were opening new possibilities in tones. Yet we in Boston may not know it and judge it for ourselves. We may mock and reject it; we may accept and extol it; probably we shall do both since the certain outcome of it is to divide and provoke minds. None the less it is the right of the public of the Symphony Concerts to hear it, and it is the bounden and neglected obligation of Dr. Muck to bring it to performance. It is incumbent on him to acquaint us with the outstanding and the debated music of the hour, and whatever its merits or demerits the music of Scriabin, Stravinsky and Schönberg is such. Many a Bostonian listening in the past to debate of novel music in Berlin and Vienna, in London and in Paris, has been able to say quietly that all this was an "old story" at the Symphony Concerts. When he listens to discussion of Schönberg, Scriabin and Stravinsky, he must hold his peace with the ignorant. The neglect of these three composers is the shortcoming and the disappointment of the year. In ninety-two pieces, in which almost every school had its due, Dr. Muck would not find room for them.

The Standard of the Soloists

The third standard of the Symphony Concerts—the standard of the "assisting artists"—fluctuated neither more nor less in the season now ending than it has in years past, being of all three that most subject to the play of human error and infirmity. The theory, if only for one season it could be rigidly and entirely carried out, is perfect. Not too many "soloists" are to be engaged, since the conductor deserves frequent concerts unhampered by them and interesting enough for the music played and the manner of the playing; they should all be singers, violinists or pianists of high and established rank or, occasionally, interesting newcomers in American concert-rooms or distinguished members of the orchestra itself; and not one of them should be called on any other ground than outstanding merit.

There were hardly too many "soloists" in the current series since ten out of the twenty-four pairs of concerts escaped them. Of the singers, Miss Farrar and Mme. Homer; of the pianists, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Bauer and Mr. Hofmann; and of the violinists, Mr. Kreisler, were unquestionably of the rank that the standards of the concerts demand. In turn, Mr. Witek, Mr. Noack, Mr. Maquarre and Mr. Holy—in a double concerto for flute and harp—are eminent virtuosi of the orchestra. Mme. Carreño, among the pianists, had an illustrious past more than present achievement to commend her and at least she stood in the way of none more deserving. Mr. Flesch was an interesting but not a remarkable newcomer, who made his way into the concerts while Mr. Thibaud, a much more distinguished violinist and the available Mr. Ysaye were not bidden to them. For the rest, it is not good for the prestige of the Symphony Concerts that pianist or singer should stir its practised public to the lifting of the eyebrows of speculation or the wagging of the tongues of surmise as to why he—or oftener she—happens to be there in the light of her own performance. If we of the audience are to be vouchsafed a theory as to "the soloists," then it is incumbent on every one concerned in the choosing of them to act according to that theory. If each season, it is to be once, twice, or thrice relaxed by what it is polite to call circumstances, then why have a theory at all?

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 3.

Review of Musical Season Which Ended Last Evening

The musical season begins in this town and ends with the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. The 24th pair of these, which took place Friday afternoon and last evening, brought to a close another period of activity among those who give and those who listen to musical entertainments.

The amount of new music played and sung and the number of new singers and instrumentalists heard is not so large as that of some other years, nor can it be said that in general the quality of the new has been disturbing or revolutionary.

In the following tables of new music and new singers or players * means the first performance or appearance in Boston; † the first performance or appearance in America. B. S. O. indicates Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Allen, Paul—*April 22, first and second movements from Symphony in D minor, New England Conservatory Orchestra, Mr Chadwick, conductor.

Brune, Adolf—*March 17, Scherzo from quartet in C minor, op 33. The Kneisels.

Carpenter, John Alden—*March 5, songs, "When I Bring You Colored Toys," "The Sleep That Flits on Baby's Eyes," Julia Culp's recital.

Chabrier, A. E.—*Feb 19, "A la Musique," chorus for women's voices, Cecilia Society.

Clapp, Philip Greeley—April 10, symphony in E minor, B. S. O., first performance.

Daniels, Mabel W.—Feb 19, chorus for mixed voices, "The Guests of Sleep," Cecilia Society, first performance; *Jan 28, song, "Beyond," Constance Purdy's recital.

Debussy—*Jan 23, "Printemps," B. S. O.

Flament, E—*Jan 22, fantasie and fugue, op. 28, for eight wind instruments, Longy Club.

Foote, Arthur—Feb 19, "Aubade," for cello and piano; Alwyn Schroeder, composer accompanying, Apollo Club concert, first performance.

Gilson, Paul—†March 31, "A Little Suite for Piano," played by Charles Strony, concert by Evelyn Scotney and Howard White.

Goldmark, Rubin—March 13, "Samson," tone poem, B. S. O., first performance.

Haydn—†April 15, symphony No. 7, "Le Midi," in C major, Pierian Sodality, Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

Hinton, Arthur—*March 17, quintet in G minor for piano and strings, Katharine Goodson and the Kneisels.

Juon, Paul—*Dec 26, "Watchman's Song," B. S. O.; *March 4, chamber symphony, op. 27, seven wind and stringed instruments and piano, Longy Club.

Korngold, Erich—*Feb 15, overture to a play, Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Mr Stokowski conductor. First music by Korngold to be played publicly in Boston.

Liszt—Jan 23, "Hungaria" tone poem, first time at B. S. O. concerts.

Loeillet—*March 4, sonata, flute, oboe and piano, Longy Club.

Moor, Emanuel—*Dec 8, prelude for violin, played by Robert Pollak at concert given with Edward Lankow; *Dec 4, suite for violin and cello, played by Messrs Pochon and D'Archambeau, Flonzaley Quartet concert.

Paladilhe, E.—†Dec 5 and 6, "Le Passant," operetta, Clayton D. Gilbert's dramatic recital, New England Conservatory. First performance anywhere in English.

Ravel—*Dec 27, Mother Goose Suite, B. S. O.

Reznicek—†April 24, "Schlemihl," biography for orchestra and organ, B. S. O.

Schillings, Max—*Oct 31, "Sea Greeting" and "Morning at Sea," B. S. O.

Schmitt, Florent—*Nov 28, "The Tragedy of Salome," B. S. O.; †Dec 18, 46th Psalm, Cecilia Society.

Schoenberg, Arnold—*Jan 29, quartet in D minor, "The Flonzaley's." First public hearing in Boston of music of Schoenberg. A private performance took place at Mrs Gardner's Fenway Court, Jan 28.

Sibelius, Jean—*Oct 24, fourth symphony, B. S. O.

Strauss, Richard—*Dec 12, Festival prelude, B. S. O.

Strube, Gustav—*March 4, quintet, Longy Club.

Urack, Otto—March 6, symphony in E major, B. S. O. First performance.

Weingartner, Felix—Dec 13, Lustige overture, first performance at B. S. O. concerts.

Schmitt and Schoenberg.

From out this list two names arise clearly above their fellows. Until this season Florent Schmitt, the composer born of Alsatian parents, but schooled in Paris, had been known only by works in small form. Now his name appears for the first time on the Symphony programs. His "Tragedy of Salome" was a work of imagination as well as workmanship. Unlike some other novelties of the year of delineative purpose, the hearer did not feel that had the composer been able to speak as directly through his score as through a pictorial or plastic art, or through speech, he would have been able to express the thoughts which he tried to express through his score. Beneath a fertile invention and skillful treatment "Salome" showed character and established moods.

Even beyond it in power to stir thought and feeling was his "Forty-Sixth Psalm." It is to be regretted that the performance could not have been adequate, for it is a work of tremendous exactions. But out of the manner of its presentation, such as it was, there came the signs of a new choral piece of swiftly moving vitality, one which would eagerly be heard in a just and sympathetic interpretation.

Opinions varied widely as to Schoenberg's quartet. None could doubt the sincere if uncompromising individuality which speaks through it. The first music of this composer heard publicly in Boston, it seems, more than any other except that of Debussy, which is in a wholly different idiom, to pursue and seize elusive and spiritual phases of consciousness, music that might have been born in another world, to be played upon less obvious and more plastic instruments than these, and in a manner shading into endless nuances.

In his swollen prelude Strauss was seen loading down his score with noise for a perfunctory celebration and pocketing the fee. Sibelius' fourth symphony was a disappointment, notwithstanding the integrity of its grim individualism. Reznicek, who came with less arresting credentials, has undoubtedly written his "Schlemihl" ably and scored it with exceeding cleverness. It sounds to a high degree, at times with eloquence. There are some passages of beauty, but when all is done there is more consciousness of noise and fury than of deep sympathy for a tragic end. Such devices and treatment as these compared for example to those of Mr Loeffler in his "Death of Tintigiles" seem the work of an apprentice rather than of a master.

Ravel's suite was unique for exquisite imagination, for lightness and delicacy of touch and for the true finesse that gave it charm.

Of the three new works heard toward the close of the Symphony season and for the first time anywhere, Mr Urack's symphony continues to emit the most effulgent rays of hope. Reflecting it may be, and doubtless without intent, the thoughts of others, it nevertheless had an honest, unpretentious but amiable spontaneity of its own, and called forth emphatic signs of enjoyment from the audience. Mr Goldmark's "Samson" was an agreeable, if not a characterizing work or one of distinction.

It does not yet appear that a paucity of ideas and futility of treatment was to be revealed by an orchestral performance of Mr Clapp's symphony which he could not have discovered as he studied his own score. The overture to a play, the first music by Erich Korngold to be performed publicly in Boston, was a pitiable confession of a gifted boy who might profitably be writing for string quartet yet for a time and studying models of orchestration.

Brune's scherzo prompted a curiosity to hear the entire quartet by this composer from Chicago. Emanuel Moor's suite for violin and cello had the flavor of a fine old wine and was worthy of the art with which it was played. Carpenter's songs hardly have caught the translucent, eternal beauty of Tagore's verse.

Dr Muck and the Orchestra.

Of those who make music, no record of the season could do other than begin with gratitude to Dr Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the well oiled routine of a great institution the orchestra goes on year after year. The consummate virtuosity of such playing as crystalized under the searching glass of such conducting will be appreciated better when it is no more. May that day be afar off.

The soloists at the Symphony concerts were as follows:

Mr Bauer, Jan 16; Mme Carreno, Feb 6; Miss Deyo, Jan 2; Mme Van Endert, †Feb 13; Miss Farrar, Oct 31; Mr Flesch, *April 3; Mr Hofmann, Dec 12; Mr Holy, Dec 19; Mme Homer, April 17; Mr Kreisler, Nov 28; Mr Maquarre, Dec 19; Mr Noack, Dec 26; Mr Paderewski, March 13; Mr Warnke, Nov 14; Mr Witek, Jan 23.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City.

Date MAY 3 - 1914

, 1884

ORCHESTRAL NOVELTIES OF THE SEASON.

Three facts loom up significantly in the story of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Borough of Manhattan—the only borough of the city which is receiving consideration in this review. These are that the ten concerts were enormously successful from a financial point of view as well as an artistic, all the seats in Carnegie Hall being subscribed for practically before the close of the preceding season. This first fact becomes especially significant from its companions, which are that the visitors from Boston made no appeal through solo performers or the production of novelties. True, Mr. Paderewski played at one concert and Mme. Van Endert at another, but the latter was unknown and remained a negligible quantity, while M. Paderewski, though he might have attracted an audience of equal size had he given a recital, could not swell the receipts for the simple reason that all the seats had been preempted nearly a year before. As for novelties, Dr. Muck gave but few in Boston and only one in New York—some of the music written for a ballet called "La Tragédi de Salomé," by Florent Schmitt, a composer new to local lists. Neither Mr. Damrosch nor Mr. Stransky scorned the products of contemporary composers, but neither of them found a work of sufficient pith and moment to challenge frequent repetitions in the future. Mr. Damrosch's list was as follows:

Symphonic poem, "Thebes"	Fanelli
Funeral march (on the death of Nordraak)	Grieg-Halversen
Concerto (for violin, piano and string orchestra)	Chausson
Symphonic suite, "Le Printemps"	Debussy
Symphonic poem, "Falstaff"	Elgar
Prelude, chorale and fugue (arranged)	Franck-Perné
Fantasy (for flute)	Huë
Adagio (for strings)	Lekeu
Symphonic suite	Victor Kolar
Sapphic poem (for violoncello)	Granville Bantock
Rumanian Rhapsodies 1 and 2	Enesco

Mr. Stransky's programmes showed a marked infusion of music of the lighter order, probably in obedience to one of the conditions of the Pulitzer bequest, partly to popularize the concerts, the audiences having changed much in character since the experiments with the permanent orchestra were begun under Mr. Mahler. Time was when a chair was handed down from parents to children like a family heirloom. If one wishes to see the old patrons of the society now one must seek them at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Stransky's novelties may be noted as follows:

Comedy Overture on Negro Themes	Gilbert
Symphonie Orientale, Op. 84	Godard
Southern Fantasy	Humiston
Lento Funebre	Grieg-Kramer
Ballet Suite from "Céphale et Procris,"	Gretry-Mottl
Theme and variations, Kaleidoscope	Noren
Ballet Suite, Op. 130	Reger
Symphonic étude, The Hunt of Prince Arthur	Ropartz
Festival Prelude, Op. 61	Richard Strauss

From

Address: New York City.

Date MAY 3 - 1914

Establishe

LATEST PHASES OF MU

Work of Most Advanced Composers Heard in Period Just Ended Along With Classics.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE concert season of 1913-14 began on October 5 with the first entertainment of the Italian Symphony Orchestra, Pietro Floridia, conductor, and came to its finish in the week just ended. The last few scattering concerts were of a nature bordering on the salon variety and made no claim upon critical discussion. But taken as a whole the concert season lasted with great activity up to the day on which the opera closed, April 25, when the Oratorio Society repeated its early winter success, Georg Schumann's "Ruth."

It has been one of the busiest musical seasons ever known in this busy city. There were orchestral concerts by five local orchestras and three visiting organizations. These entertainments amounted to about 100, while the orchestral concerts at the two opera houses and those given occasionally in the Hippodrome, the Garden and Carnegie Hall outside the established lists carried the total well above 200.

There were more important virtuoso concerts than in any other year of recent times. Paderewski, Hofmann, Bauer, Katherine Goodson and numerous other pianists appeared, while Ysaye, Kreisler, Flesch, Katherine Parlow, Kubelik, Elman and still more violinists were heard. It was an especially great violin season in respect of quantity, albeit in quality the piano department was not surpassed.

The chamber music concerts were more numerous than usual and in this particular season attained a very great significance through the importance of the new works brought forward. The Flonzaley Quartet, the Margulies Trio and the players specially engaged by the new body called the Friends of Music were most active in the publication of new music. In the production of orchestral novelties the Symphony Society of New York, conducted by Walter Damrosch, led.

The Philharmonic Society introduced some new music, but not much. The stringent conditions imposed upon this body of the Pulitzer bequest undoubtedly militate against the introduction of many novelties into its programmes. The Philharmonic is now within certain limits obliged to devote much of its time to repetition of the classics and to the performance of good music of what may be called the more popular types.

Owing to the splendid generosity of Harry Harkness Flagler, the Symphony Society, which has always been a liberal producer of new works, is now in a position of perfect independence. In fact the gift of Mr. Flagler to this organization was without question the most important incident of the musical season. It was not clearly described in the newspapers at the time when it was made; but it comes to this, that the Symphony Society of New York has now a guarantee fund twice as large as that which backs the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This guarantee fund, furthermore, is here to stay. It renders the Symphony Society absolutely independent of pecuniary considerations. It makes it possible to engage the best players to be obtained in all the world. It gives the conductor perfect freedom in the selection of novelties for production. He need not trouble himself at all about their popularity, but only about their merit. It makes the engagement of the best soloists practicable. It makes the establishment of a retiring fund for veteran players a feasible consideration. In short it puts the Symphony Society orchestra on a basis financially sounder than that enjoyed by any other orchestra in the world.

Since orchestral concerts are not as a rule money making enterprises this public spirited act of Mr. Flagler's will have beneficial results. It is only by the acquistion of a guarantee fund in one way or another that the permanence of an orchestra can be assured. New York has now two permanent orchestras. But without implying anything deprecatory toward the status of the Philharmonic Society, which is excellent, it must be said that the Symphony Society is the most independent orchestral organization now in existence.

It has been the custom of THE SUN to present at the conclusion of the musical season a list of its important incidents. This list has accordingly been prepared and is subjoined. No attempt has been made to enumerate all the infinitesimal novelties performed or sung in the winter. There have been numerous songs, some of them interesting if not important, and others neither one nor the other. At this moment the writer recalls not one which claimed instant recognition as an immortal lyric.

Some pleasing and some very meritorious piano pieces have been played for the first time, but here again there was nothing of serious significance. In some of the chamber music concerts, such as those of the Barrere ensemble, new compositions were brought forward, but among these there was hardly anything worthy of being included in a list of the season's important doings. The list below is therefore not meant to be exhaustive; its purpose is to enumerate the important features of the concert season:

October 21—Mme. Melba returned in operatic concert.

October 26—Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody" produced by Symphony Society.

October 28—Josef Hofmann returned in recital.

November 1—Ignace Paderewski's return in piano recital.

November 8—Glazunov's Fifth symphony reproduced by Boston Orchestra.

Carl Flesch, Hungarian violin

November 9—James Philip Du "Annabel Lee" orchestra and tenor s produced by People's Symphony
chestra.
November 11—Chadwick's D m quartet played for first time here Kneisels.
November 11—Debut of Eleanor Sp cer, pianist.
November 12—Debut of Victor W
genstein, pianist.
November 16—Two movements
Fanelli's "Thebes" produced by Sy phony Society.
November 18—Powell's "Sonata Vir ianesque" produced by Mr. and M Mannes.
November 20—Max Reger's "Ba
Suite" produced by Philharmonic Soci
November 21—Funeral march by Gr given here for first time by Sympho Society.
November 30—Chausson's concerto violin, piano and strings given first he ing in New York by Symphony Society
December 4—Mahler's fifth sympho revived (without cuts) by the Boston
chestra.
December 5—Georg Schumann's "Ru produced by Oratorio Society.
December 5—Debussy's suite, "Le Pr temps," produced by Symphony Society.
December 11—Debut of Beatrice Har son, English cellist.
December 12—Elgar's symphonic stu
"Falstaff" given first hearing by Sy phony Society.
December 14—Guilmant's "March Fa
tasie" and Gilbert's "Negro Rhapso produced by People's Symphony Society.
December 15—Grainger's "Walki
Tune" and Kriens's "Ronde des Latin brought out by Barrere ensemble.
January 4—Kurt Striegler's "Kamm simfonie" produced by Friends of Music
January 5—Reappearance of Jacqu
Thibaut, French violinist.
January 6—Ippolitov-Ivanov's E min symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's sharp minor piano concerto produced
Russian Symphony Society concert.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAY 2 1914

D

, 1884

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

The Brooklyn Institute is properly proud of the work of its department of music in raising the standard of concerts and the number of good ones in this borough. If it had done nothing more than to fill the Academy of Music for all the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its service to Brooklyn would be worthy of generous recognition and reward, but it has done much more. It brings the New York Symphony Orchestra here; last winter it made possible the noble Beethoven cycle, and it secures most of the notable concert soloists who would not come to Brooklyn at all if the Institute did not organize audiences for them and insure the artists against loss.

It will be news to many music lovers, who see the Academy crowded for some of these concerts and well filled for others, that almost none of these enterprises pay. The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took in $12,942—every seat being sold for all the concerts—not quite $2,600 a concert. This did not meet the expenses, Paderewski and other high-priced soloists being engaged, and the prices will be raised next season. In the case of the Boston orchestra that policy will not decrease the attendance, but it would be crippling to some of the other enterprises. Mr. Flagler meets the much larger deficits for the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra and for the Beethoven festival, and, in case of the chamber concerts and some of the recitals, the Institute itself meets them out of the income of the Sheldon fund and its other resou [illegible] eldon fund is [illegible] tute's receipts from membership fees are not nearly so large as they should be in a town of almost 2,000,000 people.

To meet this condition, which promises to be chronic, the Institute is trying to raise an endowment fund of $50,000 for its department of music. This sum, with the Sheldon fund, would enable it to meet the terms of the great artists who come here—and who have a most abnormal appreciation of the value of their services, or in some cases of their names—and yet pay the local expenses of the concerts. In some cases the visitors get 70 per cent. of the gross receipts of their concerts and in a few cases 90 per cent. How much that leaves the Institute for rent and advertising any business man can figure out. No investment would do more for the musical culture of Brooklyn than the endowment which the Institute is now seeking. It would make possible continuing concerts here on the artistic plane which the Institute has striven so hard to maintain, and would prevent the necessity of reverting to the box office standard of attractiveness. The moment that policy begins demoralization is in sight. Rag time has more followers than Beethoven. If we wish to retain Beethoven and the other masters we must make some permanent provision for their music. The sum which the Institute asks for is modest, but with its efficient management it would work wonders.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 3.

Review of Musical Season Which Ended Last Evening

The musical season begins in this town and ends with the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. The 24th pair of these, which took place Friday afternoon and last evening, brought to a close another period of activity among those who give and those who listen to musical entertainments.

The amount of new music played and sung and the number of new singers and instrumentalists heard is not so large as that of some other years, nor can it be said that in general the quality of the new has been disturbing or revolutionary.

In the following tables of new music and new singers or players * means the first performance or appearance in Boston; † the first performance or appearance in America. B. S. O. indicates Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Allen, Paul—*April 22, first and second movements from Symphony in D minor, New England Conservatory Orchestra, Mr Chadwick, conductor.

Brune, Adolf—*March 17, Scherzo from quartet in C minor, op 38. The Kneisels.

Carpenter, John Alden—*March 5, songs, "The Sleep That Flits on Baby's Eyes," "When I Bring You Colored Toys," Julia Culp's recital.

Chabrier, A. E.—*Feb 19, "A la Musique," chorus for women's voices, Cecilia Society.

Clapp, Philip Greeley—April 10, symphony in E minor, B. S. O., first performance.

Daniels, Mabel W.—Feb 19, chorus for mixed voices, "The Guests of Sleep," Cecilia Society, first performance; *Jan 28, song, "Beyond," Constance Purdy's recital.

Debussy—*Jan 23, "Printemps," B. S. O.

Flament, E—*Jan 22, fantasie and fugue, op. 28, for eight wind instruments, Longy Club.

Foote, Arthur—Feb 19, "Aubade," for cello and piano; Alwyn Schroeder, composer accompanying, Apollo Club concert, first performance.

Gilson, Paul—†March 31, "A Little Suite for Piano," played by Charles Strony, concert by Evelyn Scotney and Howard White.

Goldmark, Rubin—March 13, "Samson," tone poem, B. S. O., first performance.

Haydn—†April 15, symphony No. 7, "Le Midi," in C major, Pierian Sodality, Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

Hinton, Arthur—*March 17, quintet in C minor for piano and strings, Katharine Goodson and the Kneisels.

Juon, Paul—*Dec 26, "Watchman's Song," B. S. O.; *March 4, chamber symphony, op. 27, seven wind and stringed instruments and piano, Longy Club.

Korngold, Erich—*Feb 15, overture to a play, Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Mr Stokowski conductor. First music by Korngold to be played publicly in Boston.

Liszt—Jan 23, "Hungaria" tone poem, first time at B. S. O. concerts.

Loeillet—*March 4, sonata, flute, oboe and piano, Longy Club.

Moor, Emanuel—*Dec 8, prelude for violin, played by Robert Pollak at concert given with Edward Lankow; *Dec 4, suite for violin and cello, played by Messrs Pochon and D'Archambeau, Flonzaley Quartet concert.

Paladilhe, E.—†Dec 5 and 6, "Le Passant," operetta, Clayton D. Gilbert's dramatic recital, New England Coservatory. First performance anywhere in English.

Ravel—*Dec 27, Mother Goose Suite, B. S. O.

Reznicek—†April 24, "Schlemihl," biography for orchestra and organ, B. S. O.

Schillings, Max—*Oct 31, "Sea Greeting" and "Morning at Sea," B. S. O.

Schmitt, Florent—*Nov 28, "The Tragedy of Salome," B. S. O.; †Dec 18, 46th Psalm, Cecilia Society.

Schoenberg, Arnold—*Jan 29, quartet in D minor, "The Flonzaley's." First public hearing in Boston of music of Schoenberg. A private performance took place at Mrs Gardner's Fenway Court, Jan 28.

Sibelius, Jean—*Oct 24, fourth symphony, B. S. O.

Strauss, Richard—*Dec 12, Festival prelude, B. S. O.

Strube, Gustav—*March 4, quintet, Longy Club.

Urack, Otto—March 6, symphony in E major, B. S. O. First performance.

Weingartner, Felix—Dec 13, Lustige overture, first performance at B. S. O. concerts.

Schmitt and Schoenberg.

From out this list two names arise clearly above their fellows. Until this season Florent Schmitt, the composer born of Alsatian parents, but schooled in Paris, had been known only by works in small form. Now his name appears for the first time on the Symphony programs. His "Tragedy of Salome" was a work of imagination as well as workmanship. Unlike some other novelties of the year of delineative purpose, the hearer did not feel that had the composer been able to speak as directly through his score as through a pictorial or plastic art, or through speech, he would have been able to express the thoughts which he tried to express through his score. Beneath a fertile invention and skillful treatment "Salome" showed character and established moods.

Even beyond it in power to stir thought and feeling was his "Forty-Sixth Psalm." It is to be regretted that the performance could not have been adequate, for it is a work of tremendous exactions. But out of the manner of its presentation, such as it was, there came the signs of a new choral piece of swiftly moving vitality, one which would eagerly be heard in a just and sympathetic interpretation.

Opinions varied widely as to Schoenberg's quartet. None could doubt the sincere if uncompromising individuality which speaks through it. The first music of this composer heard publicly in Boston, it seems, more than any other except that of Debussy, which is in a wholly different idiom, to pursue and seize elusive and spiritual phases of consciousness, music that might have been born in another world, to be played upon less obvious and more plastic instruments than these, and in a manner shading into endless nuances.

In his swollen prelude Strauss was seen loading down his score with noise for a perfunctory celebration and pocketing the fee. Sibelius' fourth symphony was a disappointment, notwithstanding the integrity of its grim individualism. Reznicek, who came with less arresting credentials, has undoubtedly written his "Schlemihl" ably and scored it with exceeding cleverness. It sounds to a high degree, at times with eloquence. There are some passages of beauty, but when all is done there is more consciousness of noise and fury than of deep sympathy for a tragic end. Such devices and treatment as these compared for example to those of Mr Loeffler in his "Death of Tintigiles" seem the work of an apprentice rather than of a master.

Ravel's suite was unique for exquisite imagination, for lightness and delicacy of touch and for the true finesse that gave it charm.

Of the three new works heard toward the close of the Symphony season and for the first time anywhere, Mr Urack's symphony continues to emit the most effulgent rays of hope. Reflecting it may be, and doubtless without intent, the thoughts of others, it nevertheless had an honest, unpretentious but amiable spontaneity of its own, and called forth emphatic signs of enjoyment from the audience. Mr Goldmark's "Samson" was an agreeable, if not a characterizing work or one of distinction.

It does not yet appear that a paucity of ideas and futility of treatment was to be revealed by an orchestral performance of Mr Clapp's symphony which he could not have discovered as he studied his own score. The overture to a play, the first music by Erich Korngold to be performed publicly in Boston, was a pitiable confession of a gifted boy who might profitably be writing for string quartet yet for a time and studying models of orchestration.

Brune's scherzo prompted a curiosity to hear the entire quartet by this composer from Chicago. Emanuel Moor's suite for violin and cello had the flavor of a fine old wine and was worthy of the art with which it was played. Carpenter's songs hardly have caught the translucent, eternal beauty of Tagore's verse.

Dr Muck and the Orchestra.

Of those who make music, no record of the season could do other than begin with gratitude to Dr Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With the well oiled routine of a great institution the orchestra goes on year after year. The consummate virtuosity of such playing as crystalized under the searching glass of such conducting will be appreciated better when it is no more. May that day be afar off.

The soloists at the Symphony concerts were as follows:

Mr Bauer, Jan 16; Mme Carreno, Feb 6; Miss Deyo, Jan 2; Mme Van Endert, †Feb 13; Miss Farrar, Oct 31; Mr Flesch, *April 3; Mr Hofmann, Dec 12; Mr Holy, Dec 19; Mme Homer, April 17; Mr Kreisler, Nov 28; Mr Maquarre, Dec 19; Mr Noack, Dec 26; Mr Paderewski, March 13; Mr Warnke, Nov 14; Mr Witek, Jan 23.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City.

Date MAY 3 - 1914

ORCHESTRAL NOVELTIES OF THE SEASON.

Three facts loom up significantly in the story of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Borough of Manhattan—the only borough of the city which is receiving consideration in this review. These are that the ten concerts were enormously successful from a financial point of view as well as an artistic, all the seats in Carnegie Hall being subscribed for practically before the close of the preceding season. This first fact becomes especially significant from its companions, which are that the visitors from Boston made no appeal through solo performers or the production of novelties. True, Mr. Paderewski played at one concert and Mme. Van Endert at another, but the latter was unknown and remained a negligible quantity, while M. Paderewski, though he might have attracted an audience of equal size had he given a recital, could not swell the receipts for the simple reason that all the seats had been preempted nearly a year before. As for novelties, Dr. Muck gave but few in Boston and only one in New York—some of the music written for a ballet called "La Tragédi de Salomé," by Florent Schmitt, a composer new to local lists. Neither Mr. Damrosch nor Mr. Stransky scorned the products of contemporary composers, but neither of them found a work of sufficient pith and moment to challenge frequent repetitions in the future. Mr. Damrosch's list was as follows:

Symphonic poem, "Thebes"	Fanelli
Funeral march (on the death of Nordraak)	Grieg-Halversen
Concerto (for violin, piano and string orchestra)	Chausson
Symphonic suite, "Le Printemps"	Debussy
Symphonic poem, "Falstaff"	Elgar
Prelude, chorale and fugue (arranged)	Franck-Perné
Fantasy (for flute)	Huë
Adagio (for strings)	Lekeu
Symphonic suite	Victor Kolar
Sapphic poem (for violoncello)	Granville Bantock
Rumanian Rhapsodies 1 and 2	Enesco

Mr. Stransky's programmes showed a marked infusion of music of the lighter order, probably in obedience to one of the conditions of the Pulitzer bequest, partly to popularize the concerts, the audiences having changed much in character since the experiments with the permanent orchestra were begun under Mr. Mahler. Time was when a chair was handed down from parents to children like a family heirloom. If one wishes to see the old patrons of the society now one must seek them at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Stransky's novelties may be noted as follows:

Comedy Overture on Negro Themes	Gilbert
Symphonie Orientale, Op. 84	Godard
Southern Fantasy	Humiston
Lento Funebre	Grieg-Kramer
Ballet Suite from "Céphale et Procris,"	Gretry-Mottl
Theme and variations, Kaleidoscope	Noren
Ballet Suite, Op. 130	Reger
Symphonic étude, The Hunt of Prince Arthur	Ropartz
Festival Prelude, Op. 61	Richard Strauss

k, 1884

From

Address: New York City.

Date MAY 3 - 1914

Establishe

LATEST PHASES OF MU

Work of Most Advanced Composers Heard in Period Just Ended Along With Classics.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE concert season of 1913-14 began on October 5 with the first entertainment of the Italian Symphony Orchestra, Pietro Floridia, conductor, and came to its finish in the week just ended. The last few scattering concerts were of a nature bordering on the salon variety and made no claim upon critical discussion. But taken as a whole the concert season lasted with great activity up to the day on which the opera closed, April 25, when the Oratorio Society repeated its early winter success, Georg Schumann's "Ruth."

It has been one of the busiest musical seasons ever known in this busy city. There were orchestral concerts by five local orchestras and three visiting organizations. These entertainments amounted to about 100, while the orchestral concerts at the two opera houses and those given occasionally in the Hippodrome, the Garden and Carnegie Hall outside the established lists carried the total well above 200.

There were more important virtuoso concerts than in any other year of recent times. Paderewski, Hofmann, Bauer, Katherine Goodson and numerous other pianists appeared, while Ysaye, Kreisler, Flesch, Katherine Parlow, Kubelik, Elman and still more violinists were heard. It was an especially great violin season in respect of quantity, albeit in quality the piano department was not surpassed.

The chamber music concerts were more numerous than usual and in this particular season attained a very great significance through the importance of the new works brought forward. The Flonzaley Quartet, the Margulies Trio and the players specially engaged by the new body called the Friends of Music were most active in the publication of new music. In the production of orchestral novelties the Symphony Society of New York, conducted by Walter Damrosch, led.

The Philharmonic Society introduced some new music, but not much. The stringent conditions imposed upon this body of the Pulitzer bequest undoubtedly militate against the introduction of many novelties into its programmes. The Philharmonic is now within certain limits obliged to devote much of its time to repetition of the classics and to the performance of good music of what may be called the more popular types.

Owing to the splendid generosity of Harry Harkness Flagler, the Symphony Society, which has always been a liberal producer of new works, is now in a position of perfect independence. In fact the gift of Mr. Flagler to this organization was without question the most important incident of the musical season. It was not clearly described in the newspapers at the time when it was made; but it comes to this, that the Symphony Society of New York has now a guarantee fund twice as large as that which backs the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This guarantee fund, furthermore, is here to stay. It renders the Symphony Society absolutely independent of pecuniary considerations. It makes it possible to engage the best players to be obtained in all the world. It gives the conductor perfect freedom in the selection of novelties for production. He need not trouble himself at all about their popularity, but only about their merit. It makes the engagement of the best soloists practicable. It makes the establishment of a retiring fund for veteran players a feasible consideration. In short it puts the Symphony Society orchestra on a basis financially sounder than that enjoyed by any other orchestra in the world.

Since orchestral concerts are not as a rule money making enterprises this public spirited act of Mr. Flagler's will have beneficial results. It is only by the acquistion of a guarantee fund in one way or another that the permanence of an orchestra can be assured. New York has now two permanent orchestras. But without implying anything deprecatory toward the status of the Philharmonic Society, which is excellent, it must be said that the Symphony Society is the most independent orchestral organization now in existence.

It has been the custom of THE SUN to present at the conclusion of the musical season a list of its important incidents. This list has accordingly been prepared and is subjoined. No attempt has been made to enumerate all the infinitesimal novelties performed or sung in the winter. There have been numerous songs, some of them interesting if not important, and others neither one nor the other. At this moment the writer recalls not one which claimed instant recognition as an immortal lyric.

Some pleasing and some very meritorious piano pieces have been played for the first time, but here again there was nothing of serious significance. In some of the chamber music concerts, such as those of the Barrere ensemble, new compositions were brought forward, but among these there was hardly anything worthy of being included in a list of the season's important doings. The list below is therefore not meant to be exhaustive; its purpose is to enumerate the important features of the concert season:

October 21—Mme. Melba returned in operatic concert.

October 26—Enescou's "Rumanian Rhapsody" produced by Symphony Society.

October 28—Josef Hofmann returned in recital.

November 1—Ignace Paderewski's return in piano recital.

November 8—Glazunov's Fifth symphony reproduced by Boston Orchestra.

Carl Flesch, Hungarian violin

November 9—James Philip Du "Annabel Lee" (orchestra and tenor s produced by People's Symphony chestra.

November 11—Chadwick's D m quartet played for first time here Kneisels.

November 11—Debut of Eleanor Sp cer, pianist.

November 12—Debut of Victor W genstein, pianist.

November 16—Two movements Fanelli's "Thebes" produced by Sy phony Society.

November 18—Powell's "Sonata Virg ianesque" produced by Mr. and M Mannes.

November 20—Max Reger's "Ba Suite" produced by Philharmonic Soci

November 21—Funeral march by Gr given here for first time by Sympho Society.

November 30—Chausson's concerto violin, piano and strings given first he ing in New York by Symphony Society

December 4—Mahler's fifth sympho revived (without cuts) by the Boston chestra.

December 5—Georg Schumann's "Ru produced by Oratorio Society.

December 5—Debussy's suite, "Le Pr temps," produced by Symphony Society

December 11—Debut of Beatrice Har son, English cellist.

December 12—Elgar's symphonic stu "Falstaff" given first hearing by Sy phony Society.

December 14—Guilmant's "March Fa tasie" and Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsod produced by People's Symphony Society.

December 15—Grainger's "Walki Tune" and Kriens's "Ronde des Latin brought out by Barrere ensemble.

January 4—Kurt Striegler's "Kamme simfonie" produced by Friends of Music

January 5—Reappearance of Jacqu Thibaut, French violinist.

January 6—Ippolitov-Ivanov's E min symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's sharp minor piano concerto produced Russian Symphony Society concert.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

D MAY 2 1914

, 1884

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

The Brooklyn Institute is properly proud of the work of its department of music in raising the standard of concerts and the number of good ones in this borough. If it had done nothing more than to fill the Academy of Music for all the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its service to Brooklyn would be worthy of generous recognition and reward, but it has done much more. It brings the New York Symphony Orchestra here; last winter it made possible the noble Beethoven cycle, and it secures most of the notable concert soloists who would not come to Brooklyn at all if the Institute did not organize audiences for them and insure the artists against loss.

It will be news to many music lovers, who see the Academy crowded for some of these concerts and well filled for others, that almost none of these enterprises pay. The five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took in $12,942—every seat being sold for all the concerts—not quite $2,600 a concert. This did not meet the expenses, Paderewski and other high-priced soloists being engaged, and the prices will be raised next season. In the case of the Boston orchestra that policy will not decrease the attendance, but it would be crippling to some of the other enterprises. Mr. Flagler meets the much larger deficits for the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra and for the Beethoven festival, and, in case of the chamber concerts and some of the recitals, the Institute itself meets them out of the income of the Sheldon fund and its other resou [illegible] eldon fund is [illegible] tute's receipts from membership fees are not nearly so large as they should be in a town of almost 2,000,000 people.

To meet this condition, which promises to be chronic, the Institute is trying to raise an endowment fund of $50,000 for its department of music. This sum, with the Sheldon fund, would enable it to meet the terms of the great artists who come here—and who have a most abnormal appreciation of the value of their services, or in some cases of their names—and yet pay the local expenses of the concerts. In some cases the visitors get 70 per cent. of the gross receipts of their concerts and in a few cases 90 per cent. How much that leaves the Institute for rent and advertising any business man can figure out. No investment would do more for the musical culture of Brooklyn than the endowment which the Institute is now seeking. It would make possible continuing concerts here on the artistic plane which the Institute has striven so hard to maintain, and would prevent the necessity of reverting to the box office standard of attractiveness. The moment that policy begins demoralization is in sight. Rag time has more followers than Beethoven. If we wish to retain Beethoven and the other masters we must make some permanent provision for their music. The sum which the Institute asks for is modest, but with its efficient management it would work wonders.

[167]

PHASES OF MUSICAL ART--BUSIEST SEASON HERE

vanced Composers d Just Ended Classics.

as made; but it comes to this, that e Symphony Society of New York s now a guarantee fund twice as ge as that which backs the Boston nphony Orchestra.

This guarantee fund, furthermore, is e to stay. It renders the Symphony ciety absolutely independent of peniary considerations. It makes it posle to engage the best players to be ained in all the world. It gives the ductor perfect freedom in the seion of novelties for production. He d not trouble himself at all about ir popularity, but only about their it. It makes the engagement of best soloists practicable. It makes establishment of a retiring fund veteran players a feasible considern. In short it puts the Symphony ety orchestra on a basis financially nder than that enjoyed by any r orchestra in the world.

nce orchestral concerts are not as le money making enterprises this ic spirited act of Mr. Flagler's will beneficial results. It is only by acquistion of a guarantee fund in way or another that the permanence n orchestra can be assured. New has now two permanent orches- But without implying anything ecatory toward the status of the armonic Society, which is excelit must be said that the Symphony ty is the most independent orchesorganization now in existence.

has been the custom of THE SUN to nt at the conclusion of the musical n a list of its important incidents. ist has accordingly been prepared s subjoined. No attempt has been to enumerate all the infinitesimal ties performed or sung in the r. There have been numerous some of them interesting if not tant, and others neither one nor her. At this moment the writer not one which claimed instant ition as an immortal lyric.

e pleasing and some very mers piano pieces have been played e first time, but here again there othing of serious significance. In of the chamber music concerts, s those of the Barrere ensemble, mpositions were brought forward, nong these there was hardly anyworthy of being included in a list season's important doings. The low is therefore not meant to be tive; its purpose is to enumerate portant features of the concert ber 21—Mme. Melba returned in c concert.

ber 26—Enescou's "Rumanian dy" produced by Symphony Sober 28—Josef Hofmann returned in nber 1—Ignace Paderewski's repiano recital.

nber 8—Glazunov's Fifth symproduced by Boston Orchestra.

Carl Flesch, Hungarian violinist.

November 9—James Philip Dunn's "Annabel Lee" (orchestra and tenor solo) produced by People's Symphony Orchestra.

November 11—Chadwick's D minor quartet played for first time here by Kneisels.

November 11—Debut of Eleanor Spencer, pianist.

November 12—Debut of Victor Wittgenstein, pianist.

November 16—Two movements of Fanelli's "Thebes" produced by Symphony Society.

November 18—Powell's "Sonata Virginianesque" produced by Mr. and Mrs. Mannes.

November 20—Max Reger's "Ballet Suite" produced by Philharmonic Society.

November 21—Funeral march by Grieg given here for first time by Symphony Society.

November 30—Chausson's concerto for violin, piano and strings given first hearing in New York by Symphony Society.

December 4—Mahler's fifth symphony revived (without cuts) by the Boston Orchestra.

December 5—Georg Schumann's "Ruth" produced by Oratorio Society.

December 5—Debussy's suite, "Le Printemps," produced by Symphony Society.

December 11—Debut of Beatrice Harrison, English cellist.

December 12—Elgar's symphonic study "Falstaff" given first hearing by Symphony Society.

December 14—Guilmant's "March Fantasie" and Gilbert's "Negro Rhapsody" produced by People's Symphony Society.

December 15—Grainger's "Walking Tune" and Kriens's "Ronde des Latins" brought out by Barrere ensemble.

January 4—Kurt Striegler's "Kammersimfonie" produced by Friends of Music.

January 5—Reappearance of Jacques Thibaut, French violinist.

January 6—Ippolitov-Ivanov's E minor symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's C sharp minor piano concerto produced at Russian Symphony Society concert.

Kathleen Parlow, Canadian violinist.

January 6—Sonata in D minor for piano and violin, by Rosario Scalero, oduced by the Manneses.

January 10—First American performance of Florent Schmitt's "Tragedie de Salome" by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

January 16—First performance of Gabriel Pierne's orchestral arrangement of Cesar Franck's prelude, chorale and fugue by Symphony Society.

January 20—Verdi's "Stabat Mater" and Zandonai's "O Padre Nostro" produced at Schola Cantorum concert.

January 22—Debut of Carl Flesch, distinguished Hungarian violinist.

January 25—Victor Kolar's symphonic suite produced by Symphony Society.

January 26—Arnold Schoenberg's D minor quartet produced by the Flonzaley Quartet.

February 1—Florent Schmitt's piano quintet in B minor produced by Friends of Music.

February 8—D'Indy's "Symphonie Cevenole," Ducasse's "Variations Plaisantes sur un Theme Grave," Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique" and Widor's "Choral and Variations" produced by Symphony Society.

February 22—First concert of the Trio de Lutece.

February 24—Erich Korngold's sonata in G major for piano and violin produced by the Margulies Trio.

March 19—Rubin Goldmark's tone poem "Samson" produced by Boston Orchestra.

March 28—Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" sung by Oratoria Society.

April 15—Hamilton Harty's "Mystic Trumpeter" produced and Handel's "Acis and Galatea" revived by Columbia Chorus.

April 19—Nicola Lucellai's "Sunday at the Village," symphonic sketch, produced by Italian Symphony Orchestra.

The most noteworthy orchestral novelties in this list are Glazunov's fifth symphony, Chausson's concerto for piano, violin and orchestra, Debussy's "Le Printemps" suite, Elgar's "Falstaff" (a symphonic study), Ippolitov-Ivanov's E minor symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedie de Salome," D'Indy's "Symphonie Cevenole" and Rubin Goldmark's "Samson." In the chamber music field the notable things were first of all the D minor quartet of Schoenberg, and after that the piano quintet of Florent Schmitt.

The Paderewski of to-day.
Above—Josef Hofmann, Polish violinist.

When one comes to review mentally the season, without pausing to refer to the daily records, there is no question that the compositions of the most advanced writers are the flaming signs of the time. Elgar's "Falstaff," the most important orchestral work recently made in England, left the thoughtful hearer in a doubting state. One heard an immense amount of anxiously wrought details; themes numerous, complex, and full of intent weaving themselves in sinuous folds through a long web of orchestral polyphony, but in the end leaving one with the conviction that he had assisted at a tremendous effort of the intellect, not at a blaze of imagination.

But when one calls up visions of the new masters' works from out the vasty deep of this stormy season, one is compelled to confess that while here also one finds the product of profound mental labor, one sees this labor bestowed upon a different object. True, Schmitt's "Tragedie de Salome" is programme music, but it is legitimate. Using all the methods and manners of the extreme modernists, Schmitt has composed a work which is neither uncertain in purpose nor wavering in development. It is a finely wrought, brilliantly orchestrated delineation of moods, a piece of music which is going to be heard again and which is going to demand a high position among recent productions.

Schoenberg's remarkable quartet, produced by the Flonzaleys and played by them in a manner not to be forgotten, will also take high rank among the creations of the new men. Schmitt's quintet belongs to the new thought and falls only a little behind the Schoenberg quartet.

It is not essential now to discuss the significance of the latest phase of musical art in Europe. Whether it is to contribute anything of permanent utility to the materials or to open untrodden territory to the imagination cannot now be finally determined. But it is folly to endeavor to brush aside the music of these "post-impressionists" or "futurists," as they are sometimes called.

Their work is perhaps the product of a transitional period. Later observers will be able to gauge with clearness the value of it. They will be able to discern what it has offered to new creative masters of the first rank when such shall again enter the domain of musical art. Meanwhile there is some ground for the pointed comments of a writer in the London Times, who declared that no composer had ever succeeded in writing anything to appeal to the world at large if he declined to use the "household words" of music.

The expression is at once happy and unhappy. To this writer it immediately conjures up "The heart bowed down," the soldiers' chorus from "Faust" and similar choice selections. These belong to the "household words" of music, without which no family and no record possessor is entirely at peace.

But perhaps the "common idioms" of music is a better title. When composers set out to treat the major scale as an exception and the common chord as an exotic they are certain to come to grief in the long run.

One cannot make real music without employing the system which has been developed through ten centuries of experiment and study. Complex and wide reaching as the modern musical system is when compared with that of, let us say, Alessandro Scarlatti, it none the less rests upon the foundations built when the modern major scale became accepted as the source from which all else was to be derived.

The new masters apparently are trying to make this condition exceptional instead of fundamental. It is inconceivable that they can succeed. But that their work may vastly enrich music in the extent of its chord combinations, its tonal relations and its methods of thematic development is altogether likely. One has only to recall what has already been effected in these directions by the innovations of masters of almost the latest period, namely, Wagner, Debussy and Strauss.

As yet there is no evidence that any one of the futurists is quite as important a personage as even the least of these, but in music it has occurred before now that men of small musical invention have immensely influenced the development of the art. The student of musical history will easily recall the name of Clementi in the realm of the piano and that of Meyerbeer in the domain of opera. It may be that Schmitt and Schoenberg will contribute to the progress of music some elements of technical procedure quite as important as those introduced by these two.

Meanwhile let those who fear lest the classics be neglected or even overthrown possess their souls in undisturbed security. The works of the fathers are not yet retired. In the major concerts of the season there were seventy-five performances of Beethoven works alone, not including songs and minor piano and violin pieces. He still lives.

's receipts from membership fees not nearly so large as they should n a town of almost 2,000,000 people. o meet this condition, which promto be chronic, the Institute is tryto raise an endowment fund of 000 for its department of music. sum, with the Sheldon fund, d enable it to meet the terms of great artists who come here—and have a most abnormal apprecia-of the value of their services, or ome cases of their names—and ay the local expenses of the con- In some cases the visitors get er cent. of the gross receipts of concerts and in a few cases 90 ent. How much that leaves the ute for rent and advertising any ess man can figure out. No ument would do more for the muculture of Brooklyn than the enent which the Institute is now g. It would make possible cong concerts here on the artistic which the Institute has striven rd to maintain, and would prehe necessity of reverting to the ffice standard of attractiveness. noment that policy begins dezation is in sight. Rag time has ollowers than Beethoven. If we o retain Beethoven and the asters we must make some per provision for their music. The hich the Institute asks for is but with its efficient managewould work wonders.

[168]

From
New York City.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, MAY 2, 19

Results of Karl Muck's Training of Group of Instrumentalists Studied in Light of Modern Pieces Produced and of Standard Repertory Compositions Revived

All the good that comes of thorough rehearsal has characterized the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its thirty-third season, which closes tonight. Preparation has been the distinguishing trait of the programs which Karl Muck has offered the subscribers three to four times monthly since last October. From the moment he lifted his baton for the opening chord of Beethoven's A major symphony at his first appearance in the fall until he puts it down at the close of the "Meistersinger" prelude tonight, exact readiness will have been the mark of his own leading and of his men's playing.

Such unflagging precision in meeting the demand of every moment as the Symphony Orchestra has shown the past winter would probably be hard to match anywhere in the city except in the most competently ordered business houses. Interest in their work and desire to serve the public is manifest in all the musical organizations of the town, but the keenness of Symphony men to do high artistic service is unequaled. There could well be doubt if the orchestra itself in all the years of its effort has had a season to compare in artistic efficiency with the one just ending.

Area Explored

Fine workmanship achieved is one characteristic of the year. Another is vast amount of ground covered. An enormous musical area has been gone over and every rod of it has been investigated. Exploration has been wide and detailed. Millions of notes have been read and precious few of them have been in any way slighted, much less skipped altogether. Thousands of tone combinations have been built and there have been underpining, ground floor, upper stories and roof to every one of them. The winter's book study has been minute. Hundreds of pages have been turned, all of which have surrendered their intellectual content to the interpreters. One or two of the folios opened on the desks of conductor and player have been stubborn in yielding up their emotional meaning, but they had to reveal every point of rhythm and structure and every significant historic quality before they got back on the library shelf.

Works Representative

In other words, the conductor and men have done an arduous and a successful season's work. They have achieved a campaign which even in the light of the organization's former 32 years of service is extraordinary. They attacked the task which their public held out to them, of making known the best orchestral thinking of the present day and of relating it to the great orchestral thinking of the past. They overcame that task by siege, by open battle, by parley, by alliance and by every other method they could command. The conductor strategically and diplomatically devised his programs; the men, with consummate skill and changeless enthusiasm, performed them. Great works and small of the twentieth century were presented, and all schools of the day, all music-writing nationalities, had their opportunity. And at the same time the old repertory was revived from beginning to end. No general type of classic composition was left out, and scarcely one of the remotest subdivisions of the symphonic form can be named which suffered neglect.

Appreciation Evident

The men have swung a big job and they have done it joyously. They have had a stern schoolmaster, but one who fitted them so well to meet the weekly public tests that their term of study has been about the happiest they ever knew. Inasmuch as a feeling of complete preparedness has animated them every time they sat down to entertain their Friday afternoon and Saturday evening audiences in Symphony hall, their interpretations have been alert, free and genial. To perform music has been indeed to play. Not, however, because it has been laborless; the reading of complex modern scores has been line upon line, every point of print on the page under the conductor's eye inexorably demanding a sound from one or more of the 100 instruments. Playing has been play because it has invariably won the appreciation of the house.

Concertmaster Soloist

Geniality of approach on the part of the artists, arising from command of the technicalities of the situation, and appreciative response on the part of the house, resulting from a long-fostered ideal coming to fruition, were never more in evidence the whole season through than at the thirteenth pair of concerts on the afternoon of Jan. 23 and the evening of Jan. 24. Those were the dates of the appearance of Anton Witek, the principal violinist of the orchestra, as soloist in the Tschaikowsky concerto. Now if there had been nothing more significant in those occasions than that the eminent concertmaster was granted his annual solo opportunity in accordance with orchestra etiquette, and that he proved himself both as executant and as interpreter the equal of any of the touring violinists who came into the year's schedule, there would have only been cause for community self-congratulation. But there was in those two midseason concerts the culmination of all the effort of years. They were a point to which the institution has been moving for a decade.

Complete mastery of a great and universally accepted work by conductor, soloist and accompanying players, a brilliant undertaking all around and one conceived in Symphony hall, prepared there and fulfilled there, was the record of that week. The orchestra made itself the voice of its public. Its music not only stood for the aspiration of the city, it actually was that aspiration.

Sentiment Exchanged

Such control of musical expression implies perfect balance between the effort of the persons on the stage and the understanding of the people in the auditorium. It means adjustment of giving and receiving and equal exchange of sentiment back and forth, else the concert is a mere exhibition. In the case of a long-established artistic group of artists and its regular listeners, a performance must have a relation to all preceding work in order to be an altogether satisfying event. It must set forth historic as well as present purpose. For that reason the familiar Tschaikowsky concerto and a soloist from the ranks of the orchestra are found figuring in the highest achievement of the year.

Sibelius Considered

But that achievement is after all a static point. The orchestra has had to strive with many programs that but imperfectly told either its own aim or the public's desire. An interesting dynamic program that represented the orchestra making an advance into a new realm was that of Oct. 24 and 25, when the Sibelius fourth symphony had its first performance in Boston. Without much doubt this work far surpassed in originality of structure and in novelty and seriousness of thought all the other new compositions of the season. Yet it met a far from pleasurable reception. It did not give a fraction of the delight to the listeners that the C sharp minor symphony of Mahler gave. Eloquence fell on stolid, rhetoric on eager ears. Mahler, because he could paint surprisingly vivid things with the brush of Strauss, pleased doubly. His symphony with its gaudy color and showy pageantry won what that of Sibelius with its powerful, though gray, drama could not, a demand for a repetition.

Ravel's Idiom Enjoyed

Another composer whose work the conductor at the request of subscribers honored with two hearings was the French Ravel. He won applause extraordinary for blocking out some children's toys from left-over ends of timber he picked up in the workshop of Debussy. His "Mother Goose" fairy pieces gave some of their pleasure doubtless because the idiom in which they are written is just now familiar enough not to seem impertinent and strange enough to be spicy. This work with Debussy's "Spring" and Schmitt's "Salome" tragedy was the principal representation the modern Parisian school had.

A work which seemed written to stir the multitudes and which probably for that reason failed to impress the Symphony audiences, was the "Festival Prelude" of Richard Strauss. It is a remarkably conceived composition and the reproach of hollowness and of insincerity which got fixed on it was undeserved. It is a pioneer endeavor in balancing organ, strings, wood-wind and brass as four departments of tone combined in a harmonic scheme like four voices. It is the quartet idea of music writing in advanced and original application. It gives the organ as an orchestral instrument a place it has never before held.

A piece which made the public aware that the art of scoring has been mastered in America as thoroughly as anywhere else in the world was the first symphony of Philip Greeley Clapp. The composition may not soon be demanded for repetition but the composer will be expected again and often. A piece which exemplified the program symphony type with success was Reznicek's "Schlemihl." Devised on the basis of a series of moods rather than on that of a reel of pictures, it took hold of the imagination and conviction of listeners. The score and parts of "Schlemihl," if they are under the strict copyright rule of some modern compositions, will have to be returned to the publishers. But certainly they will not be sent back to stay.

Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor and the partner of Mr. Warnke at the first desk of the violoncellos, would not have got out of the ranks this year if he had not come forward to direct his new symphony in E major.

Schumann in Question

Among the composers whose works figured in revivals, two, Schumann and Rachmaninoff, raised the question whether the conductor's readings do not now and then just miss the point because of their severity of style. Schumann's first symphony and Rachmaninoff's second seemed over-rehearsed. There have been times before the second Muck consulate when performance of them was less accurate but nevertheless more telling. Composers who stood well the conductor's sternness were Bruckner and Franck. To urge their symphonies in D minor to expression precept upon precept was to make them glow. Compositions which do not rate among great works according to present day esthetic standards but which had inescapable appeal under Dr. Muck's baton were the Mendelssohn "Scotch" and the Goetz F major.

Visiting soloists have appeared rather infrequently, to the good of the orchestral record. Though they have all been great artists and though they have unquestionably cost the Symphony treasury high, they have not been a dependence of the director for holding the interest of his houses. Touring artists have done their most important Boston work this year not in Symphony concerts but in their recitals. It is a question whether their assistance in the concerts might not be asked for still less often. Singing soloists could reasonably be dispensed with altogether. They never perform anything with the orchestra that they cannot do far more appropriately in opera or in song recital. There is of course a vital need for pianists and even for violinists. They are required in the presentation of the great repertory concertos.

* * *

A few minor changes in the membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be made next season, but all the players in the leading positions, it is said, are to return. Rehearsals for 1914-15 begin Sept. 28. A tour to western cities will be made before the Boston concerts begin on Oct. 16. Dr. and Mrs. Muck leave Boston on Monday and take the Kaiser Wilhelm II. the next day at New York, sailing with Mr. and Mrs. Paderewski and members of the Metropolitan Opera. Dr. Muck goes first to Berlin, and later to Bayreuth. Mr. Witek, the concert master, and Mrs. Witek will sail next week. Other members of the orchestra who are to go on European vacations are Messrs. Longy, Ferir, Noack and Roth.

* * *

~~A French playbill announcing the work in Paris of the Anglo-American Opera Company, comprising members of the Boston and Covent Garden companies, which is posted on the bulletin board outside the Boston Opera House, has had many readers of late. The acclaim of performers and of scenic artists of the Boston institution going to a public across the sea is said to have stimulated interest in the opera subscription for next season. The box office managers, who are on duty daily from 10 o'clock to 3, report a brisk week of sales.~~

* * *

SAINT-SAENS SHARES APPLAUSE

Winning recall applause at the intermission which could be stopped only by all the players rising in acknowledgment, and still more at the end of the program which was appeased only when the men stood up and the conductor and concertmaster shook hands, the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its twenty-fourth public rehearsal on Friday afternoon in Symphony hall. The handclapping was principally, of course, in commendation of the orchestra's year of effort to entertain the matinee subscribers. But some of it was for the third symphony in C minor of Saint-Saens, which occupied the thought of the hearers the first part of the afternoon; and for three short works which claimed their attention the second half. The symphony had a special interest because of its important organ part, which Mr. Marshall played. The short works had an appeal as a group because they represented three distinct and representative epochs of composition. They were the third "Brandenburg" concerto of Bach, the "Coriolanus" overture of Beethoven and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner. The piano which the score of the Saint-Saens symphony and the adaptation of the Bach piece called for was played by Mr. De Voto.

Saint-Saens treated the organ not as an opportunity but as a problem. His aim in writing the work seems to have been to prove that two incongruous bodies of tone, two harmonic groups that demand different styles of treatment can be merged into a common expression. His method was one of compromise and accommodation. He studied the idiosyncrasies of both the orchestra and organ and found just where each could be persuaded to concede to the other and just where each held inexorably to its own character. He mediated between the two parties and made it indisputably plain what their common ground was. The result is a pleasing piece of music, half symphony, half accompanied organ solo and both at once. Only a French composer could have evolved a design which so admirably suited the difficulties of the situation. The organ works out the theme in equal partnership with the orchestra. It keeps its individuality as a keyboard instrument, and it does so without destroying the individuality of the bowed and blown groups of instruments. There is never any confusion of the tone colors.

[169]

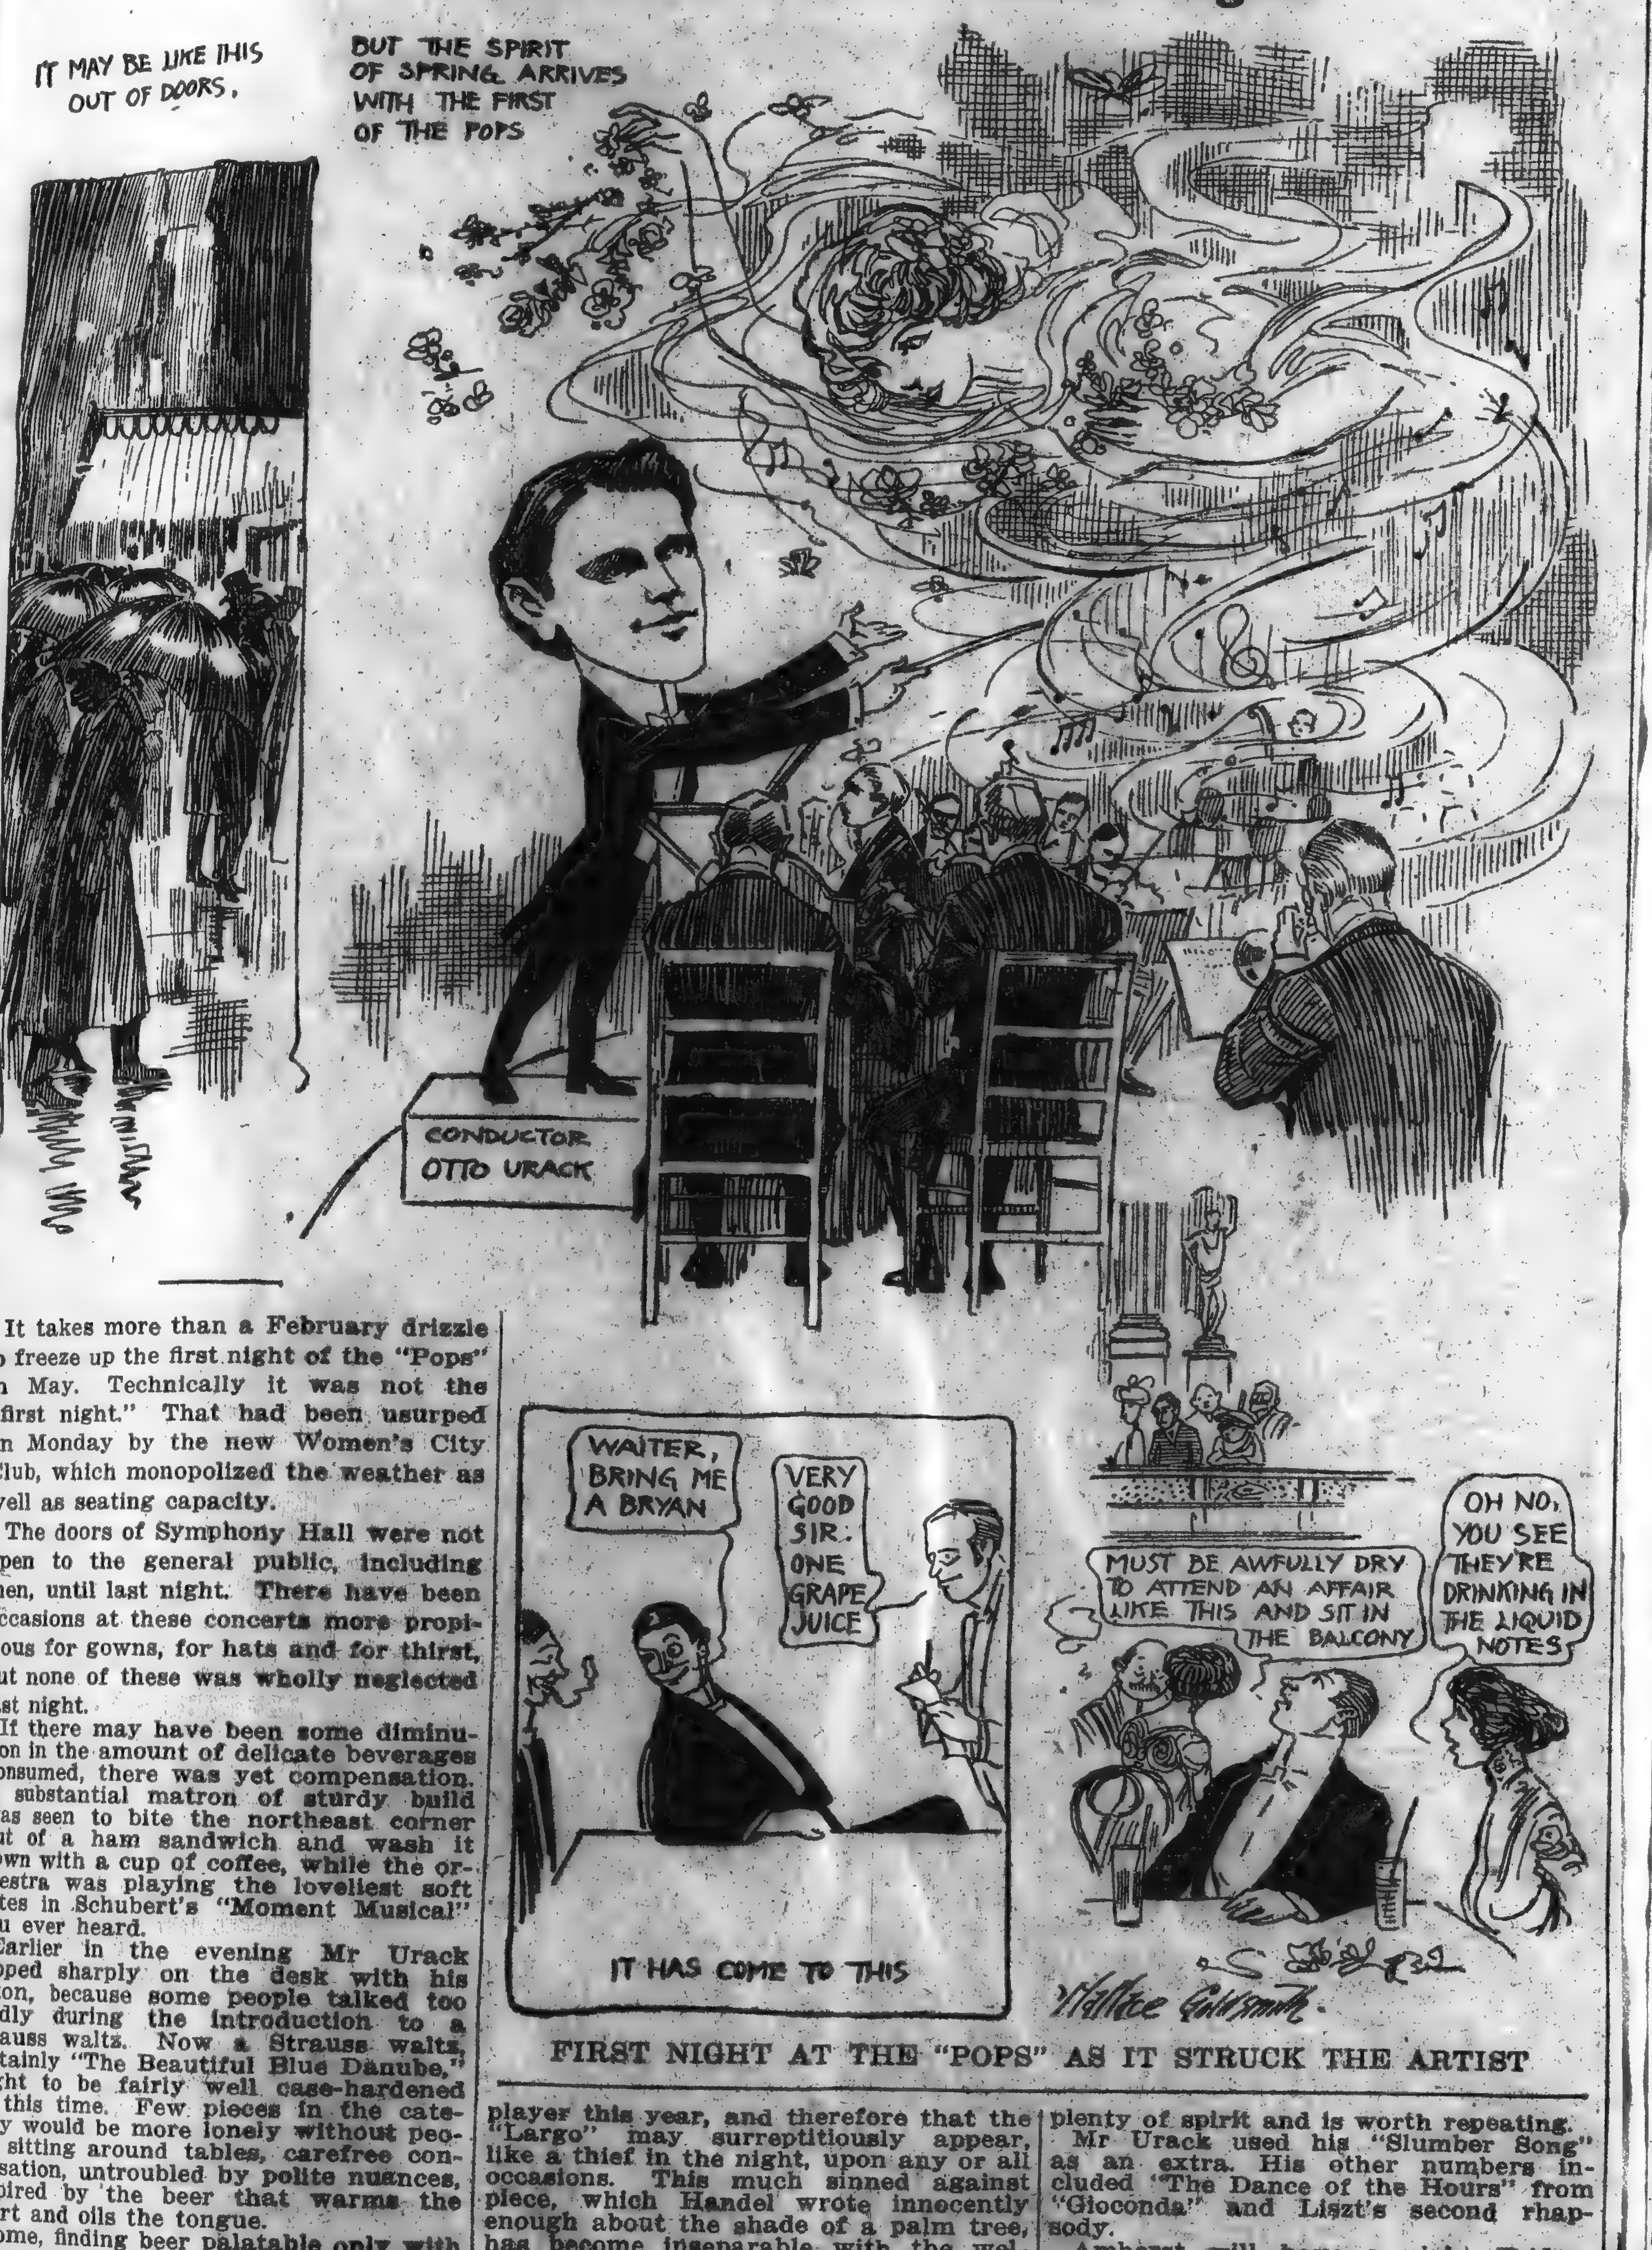
BLANK PAGE

The Pops

THE BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MAY 6,

"POPS" FORMALLY OPENED.

The Weather Is Not Allowed to Interfere With the Success of the First Public Night.



IT MAY BE LIKE THIS OUT OF DOORS.
BUT THE SPIRIT OF SPRING ARRIVES WITH THE FIRST OF THE POPS
CONDUCTOR OTTO URACK
WAITER, BRING ME A BRYAN
VERY GOOD SIR. ONE GRAPE JUICE
MUST BE AWFULLY DRY TO ATTEND AN AFFAIR LIKE THIS AND SIT IN THE BALCONY
OH NO, YOU SEE THEY'RE DRINKING IN THE LIQUID NOTES
IT HAS COME TO THIS Wallace Goldsmith

FIRST NIGHT AT THE "POPS" AS IT STRUCK THE ARTIST

It takes more than a February drizzle to freeze up the first night of the "Pops" in May. Technically it was not the "first night." That had been usurped on Monday by the new Women's City Club, which monopolized the weather as well as seating capacity.

The doors of Symphony Hall were not open to the general public, including men, until last night. There have been occasions at these concerts more propitious for gowns, for hats and for thirst, but none of these was wholly neglected last night.

If there may have been some diminution in the amount of delicate beverages consumed, there was yet compensation. A substantial matron of sturdy build was seen to bite the northeast corner out of a ham sandwich and wash it down with a cup of coffee, while the orchestra was playing the loveliest soft notes in Schubert's "Moment Musical" you ever heard.

Earlier in the evening Mr Urack rapped sharply on the desk with his baton, because some people talked too loudly during the introduction to a Strauss waltz. Now a Strauss waltz, certainly "The Beautiful Blue Danube," ought to be fairly well case-hardened by this time. Few pieces in the category would be more lonely without people sitting around tables, carefree conversation, untroubled by polite nuances, inspired by the beer that warms the heart and oils the tongue.

Some, finding beer palatable only with German music, showed a fastidious taste by ordering a light French wine with the "Mignon" overture. The echoes from "Pagliacci" demanded something stronger, more heating. Those in doubt as to the correct drink for Mr Urack's new overture, "Signor Formica," maintained a safe neutrality and drank lemonade. There was no Mexican music on the program to incite patriotic protest, or to cause any couples to dance the tango in the aisles, but despite the presence of vigilant and able-bodied waiters it would be difficult to imagine what the consequences of the provocative rhythms in Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody and the always disquieting "Jolly Students" waltz might have been on a sultry night.

The public at once should be reassured, or warned, according to its predisposition, that the orchestra will not be embarrassed for the want of a harp player this year, and therefore that the "Largo" may surreptitiously appear, like a thief in the night, upon any or all occasions. This much sinned against piece, which Handel wrote innocently enough about the shade of a palm tree, has become inseparable with the welfare of these concerts. Last night it returned, played by Mr Hoffmann, who is concert master, Mr Holy harpist and Mr Marshall at the organ, and was welcomed the more vociferously after its year's respite.

The orchestra has been increased in the number of strings this season. Mr Urack has at his disposal a larger band than some cities boast, who support a symphony orchestra.

The young conductor has his own ideas about tempi. Some of them are good and some he will do well speedily to reconsider, such as the tendency to weaken the momentum of a rhythm by the way he retards the passage.

He brought forward a new march to open the season—"Triumph" march, an undaunted title—a piece featuring harp and organ, with good melody and stirring climaxes, one that started off with plenty of spirit and is worth repeating.

Mr Urack used his "Slumber Song" as an extra. His other numbers included "The Dance of the Hours" from "Gioconda" and Liszt's second rhapsody.

Amherst will have a night Friday, May 8, and Boston University one on the following Tuesday, May 12. Wagner, not to be neglected, will be sandwiched in between them on Monday, May 11.

The program tonight will be as follows:

March, Manhattan Beach	Sousa
Overture, Light Cavalry	Suppe
Melody (Arr. by D'Indy.)	Rubinstein
Suite from Louise	Charpentier
Overture, Der Freischutz	Weber
Intermezzo, Act III, The Jewels of the Madonna	Wolf-Ferrari
Violin solo, Rondo Capriccioso (Mr Hoffmann.)	Saint-Saens
Waltz, Rathausballtänze	Strauss
Overture, 1812 (Organ, Mr Marshall.)	Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, Midsummer	Maquarre
Selection, The Little Cafe	Caryll
March, Wien bleibt Wien	Schrammel

MAY 6, 1914.
BOSTON HERALD.

RARE SHOW OF ENTHUSIASM AT POPS' OPENING

Program by Orchestra of 66 Pieces Wins Unusual Attention and Applause.

Though chill was the night and drear, enough so to keep out of sight many gay spring costumes that otherwise would have been displayed, the 29th Pops season had a brilliant and resounding opening in Symphony Hall last night. Mr. Urack conducted and the program was:

Triumph March, "Imperator Julian" (Organ, Mr. Marshall; harp, Mr. Holy.)	Urack
Overture, "Mignon"	Thomas
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Selection, "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Overture, "Signor Formica"	Urack
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Momente Musicale	Schubert
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2	Liszt
Waltz, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
Meditation (Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.)	Bach-Gounod
March, "Fairest of the Fair"	Sousa

The hall was thronged. All the seats at the tables on the main floor were occupied and the balconies were filled with a crowd that came mainly to hear the music and incidently to watch the decorously giddy folk below. While the scene was far less brilliant to the eye than usual owing to the weather that discouraged the wearing of bright gowns and hats, the whole crowd made up in enthusiasm for the orchestra and its music all lack there was in the color scheme.

Rarely, if ever, has there been more copious, spontaneous and tumultuous applause at a Pop concert. For one thing the orchestra was larger than usual, containing 66 players and it seemed to the casual glance to fill the space occupied at the Symphony concerts. Then the musicians played with unexampled spontaneity and spirit. The program, too, was one that appealed strongly to all tastes and it contained two pieces by the leader of the evening, which brought forth exuberant plaudits.

The people liked the effulgent and grandiloquent strains of Mr. Urack's march and were evidently pleased with his overture to "Signor Formica," in spite of its peculiarities. They also received with every evidence of pleasure his "Slumber Song," that was inserted as an extra number.

Two selections were the features of the concert. They were Handel's "Largo," played as an extra, and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," in both of which the organ was used. The "Largo" was listened to with a rapt attention that was remarkable. The bottles and glasses on the tables were forgotten. Not a cigar or cigarette was drawn upon.

Even the waiters stood motionless. The applause that followed the last strain of it was tremendous and for a time threatened to keep on indefinitely.

"Meditation" was received with an almost equal demonstration. One could wish that those who now and then sneer at the "old music" could have seen and heard the reception to those two pieces. It would be interesting to ask, then, to point out one of the extreme examples of the so-called "modern" music that would either now or in the future produce such an effect on a great and cultivated audience as did those "old" pieces.

JOURNAL—
WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

SOCIETY ATTENDS OPENING OF POPS

Urack Conducts Symphony Orchestra on Opening Night.

There was almost a full house at the opening of the twenty-ninth Pop concert season at Symphony Hall last night. That fact itself was the best possible illustration of the popularity of the Pops. The storm simply could not keep the crowd away.

This good attendance, plus warm appreciation of most of the numbers on the program, combined to make a pleasant and auspicious opening. The orchestra of sixty-five Symphony men is now larger than ever. Otto Urack is the present leader. He is young and talented. His position as assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, testifies to his fitness, and besides being a spirited conductor he is a gifted composer. Several of his compositions, notably the "Imperator Julian March" and the overture to Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," were played, to the great pleasure of the audience.

The other numbers, not to mention the encores, were the "Mignon" overture, the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz, selections from "Pagliacci," ballet music from "Gioconda," Schubert's "Moment Musicale," Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody, the second one of the Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies, the old and always welcome "Estudiatina" waltz, the Bach-Gounod "Mediatation" and a Sousa march. This last number, "The Fairest of the Fair," was the most marked concession to the popular taste, yet it must be said that nearly all the selections were heartily applauded.

There were solos here and there, performed by Jacques Hoffmann, who is the concert-master of the Pop orchestra; Mr. Holy, the harpist, and Professor Marshall, organist. These soloists are all prominent members of the Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts, as usual, are under the expert management of C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and L. H. Mudgett. Refreshments are served at tables on the floor and in the room off the lower

---

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 6, 1914

MAY BRINGS "THE POPS"

For the Twenty-Ninth Time, They Begin Again—The Changes of Recent Years and Their Consequences—Conductor, Programme, Smoke, Drink and Quiet Enjoyment

Institution that the "Pop" concerts are, they do change in degree from season to season, sometimes by the will of the management seeking to better them in one or another respect and sometimes by the wish of the audiences gradually manifested and heeded. It is the management that has increased the orchestra until, last evening, more than sixty men sat on the stage of Symphony Hall. More, too, of the abler players of the several choirs in the Symphony Orchestra, as they are constituted in the winter, now remain in their places through the spring. The elder generation of these virtuosi used to look somewhat askance at "The Pops," having a "position" to maintain that may have needlessly preoccupied them. The new-comers of recent years, especially in the wind choirs, trumpets, for example, sound as they did last evening, and a new public discovers in Mr. Holy the most expert and imaginative harpist that this town has known for long.

It is the management, again, that now has each extra number placarded by title, as the conductor chooses it, so that the audience may know what piece it is hearing, though usually it recognizes an "old favorite"—Händel's Largo or the Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann"—before the band has played ten measures. One advantageous change, however, the management still labors vainly to effect—the shortening of the pause between a regular and an extra number. Twice or thrice last evening, the audience asked an "extra" and Mr. Urack willingly accorded it. Then ensued three or four minutes of vague and aimless waiting, awkward for audience and awkward for orchestra. In it the zest for the "extra" plainly evaporated.

* * *

The audiences, in turn, by quiet, gradual, but ultimately pervading process, have also worked their changes in "The Pops"—chiefly in manners and customs. For one thing increasingly plain to those that knew the concerts ten and even five years ago, the abstemious first and second balconies are probably most responsible. Those that find places there smoke not, drink not, chatter not. They take their chairs as at a regular concert of the winter, programme in hand. They have come to listen to music that pleases them. Not often will the little restaurant, that the management has opened in what is usually the chorus-room, tempt them from the straight path of dutiful listening. They will not mix with light music the pleasures of light liquors and light talk. They of the balconies are a silent folk.

By insidious, but permeating process, this silence has spread downward to the less dutiful and more cheerful floor. Fortunately tobacco is still "burned" plentifully there and the liquors of the vine and the malt house amiably consumed. On the other hand, while the music is proceeding, the audience of the tables chatters much less than it used to do. Now it listens almost as attentively as does the more so much, however, it is a pity th gaiety and the freedom of "The P should be lessened. And where else in whole town, except in musicales in d ing rooms in the full season, has i possible to take the pleasure—for pl it is—of conversation against a back of music? Fortunately, the " nights" are a corrective, and the mo youth of the town flock to "The Pops better for them in their true estate. ought they to become middle-aged and ful.

* * *

These were the changes, visible audible, to be praised and to be regre last evening, when for another spri "The Pops" began again. Mr. Urack the sixty men aforesaid, and no conduc "at these concerts," since Mr. Novelli time, has made so much of the opera fragments that strew the programm Mr. Urack had had his experience operatic conducting and so far as orchestra, none too practised in op atic phrasing and expression, will le he makes the overture to "Migno and a "selection" from "Pagliacci, example, sound as though they were ope Whatever the piece, Mr. Urack, besides painstaking almost to a fault. When Muck's health is as firm as it was season, Mr. Urack's one chance to p his skill and individuality as a cond comes at "The Pops." Then and ther he show his audiences that he has hi ideas of pace and pause and progre and that he can achieve "original r ings" in which rhythm, as in Chabri "España" last evening, fares none to w Yet it may be doubted whether many the audience care for the nonce to e cise their minds upon the theory practice of conducting, as Mr. Ura any one else exemplifies it. That is work. Straightforward and spirited ing is the word for "The Pops."

Otherwise all else went in the fam and pleasurable way. Waltzes by Str and Waldteufel, ballet music out o Gioconda," the second Hungarian rha of Liszt, two of Mr. Urack's own pi pompous march and a fanciful little ture—and tonal sweetmeats, like Ha Largo and Gounod's "Meditatio diversified the programme according manifold likings of the audience.

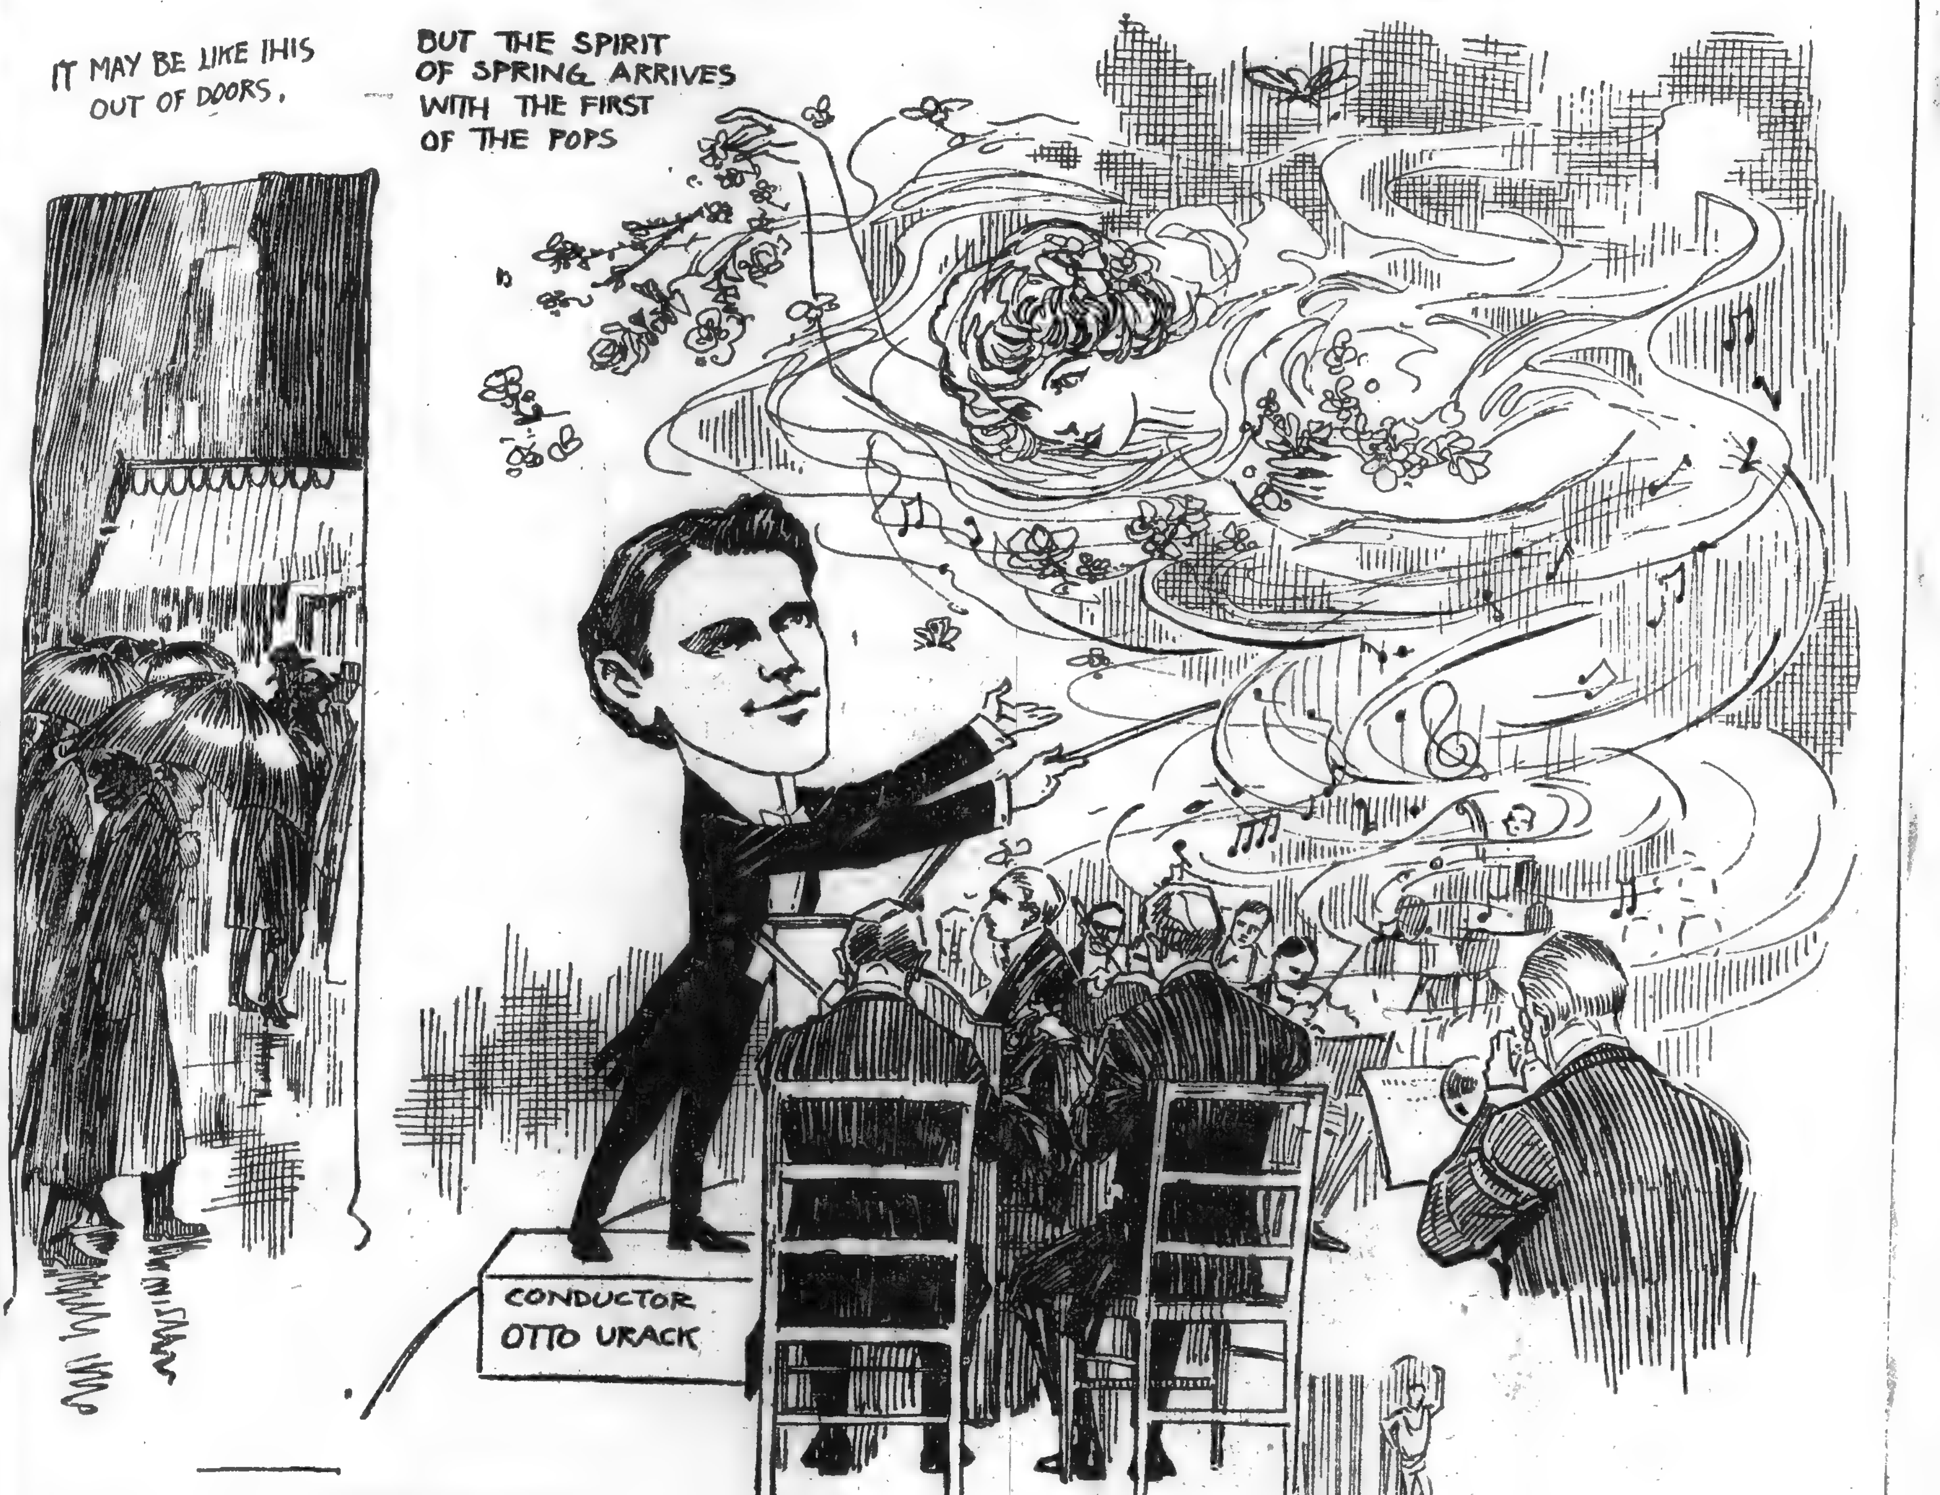
orchestra played as though it still vision the stimulating and exacting of Dr. Muck, several hundred miles Nantucket Lightship. The golden wi Germany and the beers of St. Loui Milwaukee still kept their flavor and pily, the high cost of pleasure has n touched the price-list at "The Pops. smoky haze wove itself once more softened even the outlines of those kin hats which spring millinery claps the heads of the innocent as the thing. For compensation, another mode—the great bows worn like Ja obis—splashed the floor with dash color, good to see. Everyone listened tentedly and took the pleasure of the ing quietly. If only there had been tle more of the gay and running ta old! Those silent balconies are an sidious thing.

H.

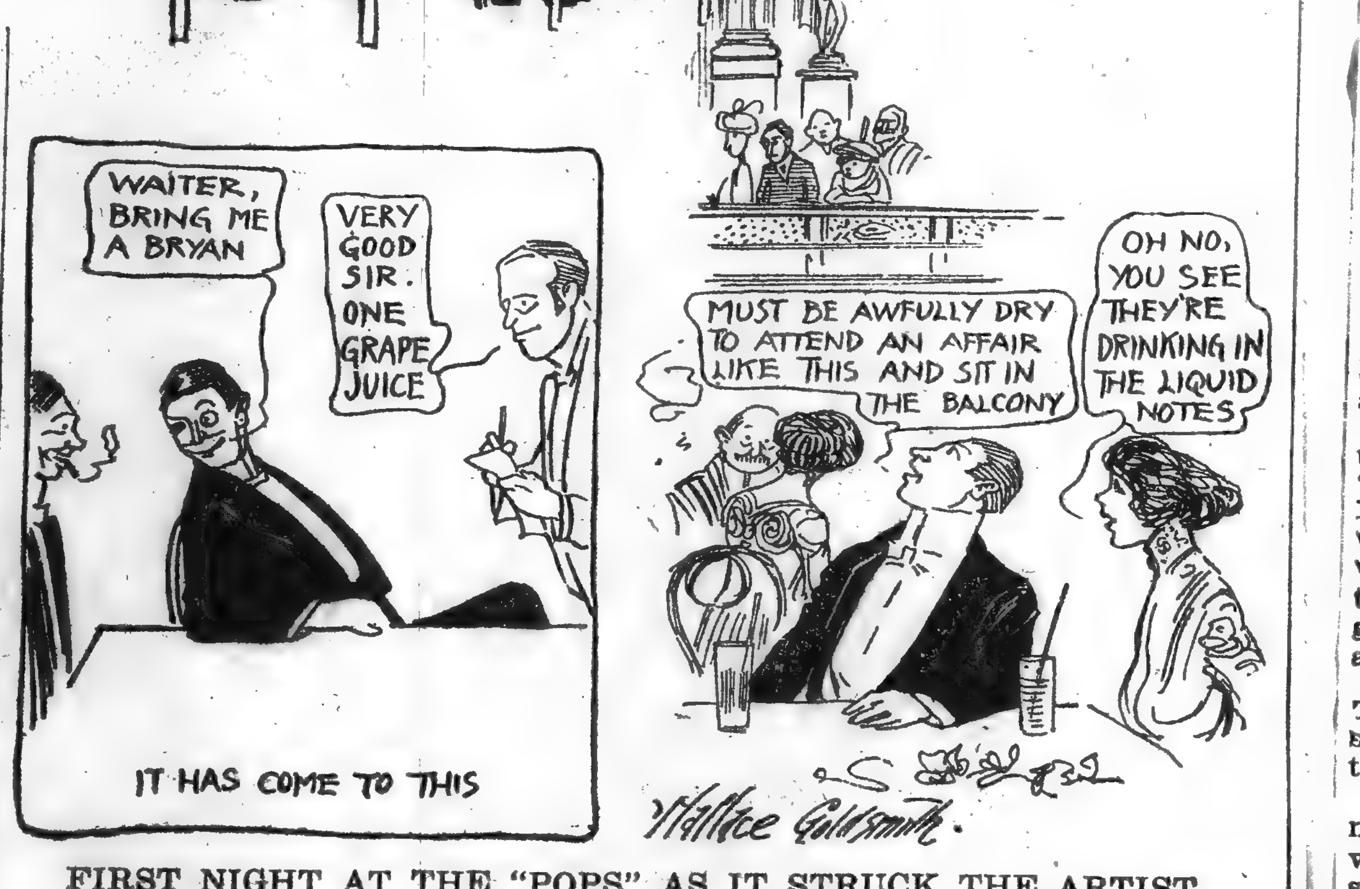
THE BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

"POPS" FORMALLY OPENED.

The Weather Is Not Allowed to Interfere With the Success of the First Public Night.



IT MAY BE LIKE THIS OUT OF DOORS,
BUT THE SPIRIT OF SPRING ARRIVES WITH THE FIRST OF THE POPS
CONDUCTOR OTTO URACK



WAITER, BRING ME A BRYAN
VERY GOOD SIR. ONE GRAPE JUICE
MUST BE AWFULLY DRY TO ATTEND AN AFFAIR LIKE THIS AND SIT IN THE BALCONY
OH NO, YOU SEE THEY'RE DRINKING IN THE LIQUID NOTES
IT HAS COME TO THIS Wallace Goldsmith

FIRST NIGHT AT THE "POPS" AS IT STRUCK THE ARTIST

It takes more than a February drizzle to freeze up the first night of the "Pops" in May. Technically it was not the "first night." That had been usurped on Monday by the new Women's City Club, which monopolized the weather as well as seating capacity.

The doors of Symphony Hall were not open to the general public, including men, until last night. There have been occasions at these concerts more propitious for gowns, for hats and for thirst, but none of these was wholly neglected last night.

If there may have been some diminution in the amount of delicate beverages consumed, there was yet compensation. A substantial matron of sturdy build was seen to bite the northeast corner out of a ham sandwich and wash it down with a cup of coffee, while the orchestra was playing the loveliest soft notes in Schubert's "Moment Musical" you ever heard.

Earlier in the evening Mr Urack rapped sharply on the desk with his baton, because some people talked too loudly during the introduction to a Strauss waltz. Now a Strauss waltz, certainly "The Beautiful Blue Danube," ought to be fairly well case-hardened by this time. Few pieces in the category would be more lonely without people sitting around tables, carefree conversation, untroubled by polite nuances, inspired by the beer that warms the heart and oils the tongue.

Some, finding beer palatable only with German music, showed a fastidious taste by ordering a light French wine with the "Mignon" overture. The echoes from "Pagliacci" demanded something stronger, more heating. Those in doubt as to the correct drink for Mr Urack's new overture, "Signor Formica," maintained a safe neutrality and drank lemonade. There was no Mexican music on the program to incite patriotic protest, or to cause any couples to dance the tango in the aisles, but despite the presence of vigilant and able-bodied waiters it would be difficult to imagine what the consequences of the provocative rhythms in Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody and the always disquieting "Jolly Students" waltz might have been on a sultry night.

The public at once should be reassured, or warned, according to its predisposition, that the orchestra will not be embarrassed for the want of a harp player this year, and therefore that the "Largo" may surreptitiously appear, like a thief in the night, upon any or all occasions. This much sinned against piece, which Handel wrote innocently enough about the shade of a palm tree, has become inseparable with the welfare of these concerts. Last night it returned, played by Mr Hoffmann, who is concert master, Mr Holy harpist and Mr Marshall at the organ, and was welcomed the more vociferously after its year's respite.

The orchestra has been increased in the number of strings this season. Mr Urack has at his disposal a larger band than some cities boast, who support a symphony orchestra.

The young conductor has his own ideas about tempi. Some of them are good and some he will do well speedily to reconsider, such as the tendency to weaken the momentum of a rhythm by the way he retards the passage.

He brought forward a new march to open the season—"Triumph" march, an undaunted title—a piece featuring harp and organ, with good melody and stirring climaxes, one that started off with plenty of spirit and is worth repeating.

Mr Urack used his "Slumber Song" as an extra. His other numbers included "The Dance of the Hours" from "Gioconda" and Liszt's second rhapsody.

Amherst will have a night Friday, May 8, and Boston University one on the following Tuesday, May 12. Wagner, not to be neglected, will be sandwiched in between them on Monday, May 11.

The program tonight will be as follows:

March, Manhattan Beach	Sousa
Overture, Light Cavalry	Suppe
Melody	Rubinstein
(Arr. by D'Indy.)
Suite from Louise	Charpentier
Overture, Der Freischutz	Weber
Intermezzo, Act III, The Jewels of the Madonna	Wolf-Ferrari
Violin solo, Rondo Capriccioso	Saint-Saens
(Mr Hoffmann.)
Waltz, Rathausballtanze	Strauss
Overture, 1812	Tschaikowsky
(Organ, Mr Marshall.)
Intermezzo, Midsummer	Maquarre
Selection, The Little Cafe	Caryll
March, Wien bleibt Wien	Schrammel

MAY 6, 1914.
BOSTON HERALD.

RARE SHOW OF ENTHUSIASM AT POPS' OPENING

Program by Orchestra of 66 Pieces Wins Unusual Attention and Applause.

Though chill was the night and drear, enough so to keep out of sight many gay spring costumes that otherwise would have been displayed, the 29th Pops season had a brilliant and resounding opening in Symphony Hall last night. Mr. Urack conducted and the program was:

Triumph March, "Imperator Julian"	Urack
(Organ, Mr. Marshall; harp, Mr. Holy.)
Overture, "Mignon"	Thomas
Waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube"	Strauss
Selection, "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
Overture, "Signor Formica"	Urack
Ballet music from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Momente Musicale	Schubert
Rhapsody, "Espana"	Chabrier
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2	Liszt
Waltz, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
Meditation	Bach-Gounod
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.)
March, "Fairest of the Fair"	Sousa

The hall was thronged. All the seats at the tables on the main floor were occupied and the balconies were filled with a crowd that came mainly to hear the music and incidently to watch the decorously giddy folk below. While the scene was far less brilliant to the eye than usual owing to the weather that discouraged the wearing of bright gowns and hats, the whole crowd made up in enthusiasm for the orchestra and its music all lack there was in the color scheme.

Rarely, if ever, has there been more copious, spontaneous and tumultuous applause at a Pop concert. For one thing the orchestra was larger than usual, containing 66 players and it seemed to the casual glance to fill the space occupied at the Symphony concerts. Then the musicians played with unexampled spontaneity and spirit. The program, too, was one that appealed strongly to all tastes and it contained two pieces by the leader of the evening, which brought forth exuberant plaudits.

The people liked the effulgent and grandiloquent strains of Mr. Urack's march and were evidently pleased with his overture to "Signor Formica," in spite of its peculiarities. They also received with every evidence of pleasure his "Slumber Song," that was inserted as an extra number.

Two selections were the features of the concert. They were Handel's "Largo," played as an extra, and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," in both of which the organ was used. The "Largo" was listened to with a rapt attention that was remarkable. The bottles and glasses on the tables were forgotten. Not a cigar or cigarette was drawn upon.

Even the waiters stood motionless. The applause that followed the last strain of it was tremendous and for a time threatened to keep on indefinitely.

"Meditation" was received with an almost equal demonstration. One could wish that those who now and then sneer at the "old music" could have seen and heard the reception to those two pieces. It would be interesting to ask, then, to point out one of the extreme examples of the so-called "modern" music that would either now or in the future produce such an effect on a great and cultivated audience as did those "old" pieces.

JOURNAL—
WEDNESDAY, MAY 6.

SOCIETY ATTENDS OPENING OF POPS

Urack Conducts Symphony Orchestra on Opening Night.

There was almost a full house at the opening of the twenty-ninth Pop concert season at Symphony Hall last night. That fact itself was the best possible illustration of the popularity of the Pops. The storm simply could not keep the crowd away.

This good attendance, plus warm appreciation of most of the numbers on the program, combined to make a pleasant and auspicious opening. The orchestra of sixty-five Symphony men is now larger than ever. Otto Urack is the present leader. He is young and talented. His position as assistant con- [illegible] proximately [illegible] the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, testifies to his fitness, and besides being a spirited conductor he is a gifted composer. Several of his compositions, notably the "Imperator Julian March" and the overture to Mr. Urack's opera, "Signor Formica," were played, to the great pleasure of the audience.

The other numbers, not to mention the encores, were the "Mignon" overture, the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz, selections from "Pagliacci," ballet music from "Gioconda," Schubert's "Moment Musicale," Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody, the second one of the Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies, the old and always welcome "Estudiatina" waltz, the Bach-Gounod "Mediatation" and a Sousa march. This last number, "The Fairest of the Fair," was the most marked concession to the popular taste, yet it must be said that nearly all the selections were heartily applauded.

There were solos here and there, performed by Jacques Hoffmann, who is the concert-master of the Pop orchestra; Mr. Holy, the harpist, and Professor Marshall, organist. These soloists are all prominent members of the Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts, as usual, are under the expert management of C. A. Ellis, W. H. Brennan and L. H. Mudgett. Refreshments are served at tables on the floor and in the room off the lower left-hand corner of the first [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT,
MAY 6, 1914

MAY BRINGS "THE POPS"

For the Twenty-Ninth Time, They Begin Again—The Changes of Recent Years and Their Consequences—Conductor, Programme, Smoke, Drink and Quiet Enjoyment

Institution that the "Pop" concerts are, they do change in degree from season to season, sometimes by the will of the management seeking to better them in one or another respect and sometimes by the wish of the audiences gradually manifested and heeded. It is the management that has increased the orchestra until, last evening, more than sixty men sat on the stage of Symphony Hall. More, too, of the abler players of the several choirs in the Symphony Orchestra, as they are constituted in the winter, now remain in their places through the spring. The elder generation of these virtuosi used to look somewhat askance at "The Pops," having a "position" to maintain that may have needlessly preoccupied them. The new-comers of recent years, especially in the wind choirs, are of [illegible] trumpets, for example, sound as they did last evening, and a new public discovers in Mr. Holy the most expert and imaginative harpist that this town has known for long.

It is the management, again, that now has each extra number placarded by title, as the conductor chooses it, so that the audience may know what piece it is hearing, though usually it recognizes an "old favorite"—Händel's Largo or the Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann"—before the band has played ten measures. One advantageous change, however, the management still labors vainly to effect—the shortening of the pause between a regular and an extra number. Twice or thrice last evening, the audience asked an "extra" and Mr. Urack willingly accorded it. Then ensued three or four minutes of vague and aimless waiting, awkward for audience and awkward for orchestra. In it the zest for the "extra" plainly evaporated.

The audiences, in turn, by quiet, gradual, but ultimately pervading process, have also worked their changes in "The Pops"—chiefly in manners and customs. For one thing increasingly plain to those that knew the concerts ten and even five years ago, the abstemious first and second balconies are probably most responsible. Those that find places there smoke not, drink not, chatter not. They take their chairs as at a regular concert of the winter, programme in hand. They have come to listen to music that pleases them. Not often will the little restaurant, that the management has opened in what is usually the chorus-room, tempt them from the straight path of dutiful listening. They will not mix with light music the pleasures of light liquors and light talk. They of the balconies are a silent folk.

By insidious, but permeating process, this silence has spread downward to the less dutiful and more cheerful floor. Fortunately tobacco is still "burned" plentifully there and the liquors of the vine and the malt house amiably consumed. On the other hand, while the music is proceeding, the audience of the tables chatters much less than it used to do. Now it listens almost as attentively as does the more [illegible]

so much, however, it is a pity tha gaiety and the freedom of "The P should be lessened, and where else in whole town, except in musicales in d ing rooms in the full season, has it possible to take the pleasure—for pl it is—of conversation against a backg of music? Fortunately, the "c nights" are a corrective, and the mo youth of the town flock to "The Pops better for them in their true estate. ought they to become middle-aged and ful.

These were the changes, visible audible, to be praised and to be regre last evening, when for another spri "The Pops" began again. Mr. Urack the sixty men aforesaid, and no conduc "at these concerts," since Mr. Novelli time, has made so much of the opera fragments that strew the programm Mr. Urack had had his experience operatic conducting and so far as orchestra, none too practised in op atic phrasing and expression, will let h he makes the overture to "Migno and a "selection" from "Pagliacci," example, sound as though they were ope Whatever the piece, Mr. Urack, besides painstaking almost to a fault. When Muck's health is as firm as it was season, Mr. Urack's one chance to p his skill and individuality as a cond comes at "The Pops." Then and ther he show his audiences that he has hi ideas of pace and pause and progr and that he can achieve "original r ings" in which rhythm, as in Chabrie "España" last evening, fares none to w Yet it may be doubted whether many the audience care for the nonce to cise their minds upon the theory practice of conducting, as Mr. Ura any one else exemplifies it. That is work. Straightforward and spirited ing is the word for "The Pops."

Otherwise all else went in the fami and pleasurable way. Waltzes by Str and Waldteufel, ballet music out of Gioconda," the second Hungarian rha of Liszt, two of Mr. Urack's own pie pompous march and a fanciful little ture—and tonal sweetmeats, like H Largo and Gounod's "Meditatio diversified the programme according manifold likings of the audience.

orchestra played as though it still s vision the stimulating and exacting of Dr. Muck, several hundred miles e Nantucket Lightship. The golden wi Germany and the beers of St. Lou Milwaukee still kept their flavor and, pily, the high cost of pleasure has n touched the price-list at "The Pops." smoky haze wove itself once more u softened even the outlines of those p kin hats which spring millinery claps the heads of the innocent as the c thing. For compensation, another mode—the great bows worn like Ja obis—splashed the floor with dash color, good to see. Everyone listened tentedly and took the pleasure of the ing quietly. If only there had been tle more of the gay and running ta old! Those silent balconies are an sidious thing.

H.

TIGHT BINDING

RECORD.

MAY 6 1914

CROWD AT POPS OPENING

With the sure things,—Death and Taxes, many are now inclined to class Female Suffrage. And Bostonians have learned to regard as pleasantly inevitable the Pops. The 29th season opened, last night, in Symphony Hall, and opened as usual with rain. And the usual crowd was present, with a familiar programme of superior light music by the finest orchestra playing in a beer garden in any city of the world.

Mr. Otto Urack, who will conduct for the first three weeks of the season, had composed for the occasion a march styled the "Imperator Julien." Being sonorous and sound, with liberal use of the organ, it was roundly applauded. Other numbers were Thomas' Overture from "Mignon," the "Beautiful Blue Danube," Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, ballet music from "Gioconda," Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody," and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," ever popular, with Mr. Hoffman in the solo for violin, Mr. Marshall at the organ, and Mr. Holy in the harp part.

OTTO URACK,
The young Pops conductor, who played his own 'Imperator Julien.''

It has been agreeable to note with passing years a gradual unbending on the part of Pop conductors and audiences. Time was when beer was taken like communion wine, and an enthusiast demonstrating with his feet was made to feel like a wretch caught in kicking his grandmother's tomb. That is past now. The urbane "Sun" no longer twinkles over these concerts as over an excursion of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, viewing the two as extremes of Boston sportiveness. True, it is still considered ill bred to mention drink to a waiter during the "Ave Maria," but during a waltz or an overture one may chat as freely as at the opera. To unbend is good. There is no acreage of starched shirt-front in Bohemia.

TRAVELER

MAY 6, 1914.

POPS FOR 1914 GET FINE START

Crowded House on the Opening Night and Enthusiasm Runs High.

The Pops for 1914 got a flying start last evening in Symphony Hall with tables all taken, both balconies filled and a program that will challenge the best of the season. Otto Urack was at the conductor's desk, and so ably directed his sixty odd players that enthusiasm ran high throughout the evening.

The first number, the conductor's "Imperator Julian" march, hit the popular fancy. Mr. Urack was compelled to repeatedly acknowledge the applause of the house. From then on it was simply a case of one good thing after another, with those selections that made a particularly good impression being followed by insistent demands for an encore. These, as is the custom at the Pops, were readily granted. One extra number, Handel's "Largo," fairly swept the audience off its feet. It was exceptionally well given even for the Pops, and was followed by enthusiastic outbursts that would not be satisfied until Mr. Hoffmann, concert master; Mr. Holly, harpist, and Mr. Marshall at the organ had risen times without count to receive the approval of the house.

Such an audience as such a night can leave little doubt as to the success of the season. Tonight's program will be:

March, "Manhattan Beach"	Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Melody (Arr. by D'Indy).	Rubinstein
Suite from "Louise"	Charpentier
Overture, "Der Freischnetz"	Weber
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Violin Solo, "Rondo Capriccioso" (Mr. Hoffmann).	Saint-Saens
Waltz, "Rathausballtaenze"	Strauss
Overture, "1812" (Organ, Mr. Marshall).	Tschaikowsky
Intermezzo, "Midsummer"	Maquarre
Selection, "The Little Cafe"	Caryll
March, "Wien bleibt Wien"	Schrammel

BOSTON POST,

MAY 6, 1914

BIG CROWD AT OPENING OF "POPS"

Large Orchestra Inaugurates 29th Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

In spite of the rain, the biggest audience which has gathered for any opening of a Pop concert season was in evidence last night in Symphony Hall. The hall was sold out. The patronage of these concerts has increased rapidly in late seasons, but it is seldom that an opening has been so well attended. "Opening" it was, in spite of the concert given on Monday night for the Women's City Club and their guests. Last night the doors were thrown open for the first time in the 29th season of these concerts to the general public, and the general public assembled in large numbers and showed its satisfaction.

URACK'S MARCH PLAYED

The attendance aside, the opening, musically speaking, was uncommonly brilliant. Mr. Urack's new march, "Imperator Julian," which inaugurated the programme, met with a deserved success. It is a march for such an occasion, scored for a big modern orchestra, with organ, and it is effective in a manner that reminds one of the scoring of Strauss' "Festival Prelude" played at one of the Symphony concerts earlier in the spring.

Nearly all of the performances were exceptionally spirited and finished. Needless to say, a Pop concert is not given the extended rehearsals necessary for a big programme of serious music, such as is heard at the subscription series of Symphony concerts in the winter; but the clearness and rhythmic cleanness, the phrasing and the shading in the performance of Thomas' "Mignon" overture would have given pleasure under any circumstances.

Other compositions on the programme were Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, the ballet music from "La Gioconda," Chabrier's "Espana"—one of the wittiest pieces of music in experience; Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" No. 2, the Handel "Largo," with organ, which was played as an encore; the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria, in which Jacques Hoffmann played the violin solo, and other music by Leoncavallo, Schubert, Waldteufel and Sousa. John P. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, took the organ parts.

As has become more and more customary of late, the music was listened to in silence and with respectful attention. It used not to be so, nor is a Pop concert supposed to be a solemn ceremonial. There are liquids and ices. Conversation need not concern itself with discussion of the later orchestral works of Johannes Brahms.

A conductor need not demand that his audience suspend all operations to watch his baton. One can amuse himself, even at a concert in Boston. On the other hand, the fact that the audiences which now gather for these Pop concerts do so far more for the sake of the music than for the purpose of chatting away an idle hour and the quality and quantity of the applause testify to the hold the concerts now have on the public and bear witness to their value as well as their entertaining character. It is hardly necessary to say that there was much enthusiastic recognition of the performances of the evening, and, as usual, a considerable number of encores were added to the programme as announced.

ADVERTISER.

MAY 6, 1914

THE "POPS" OPEN WITH USUAL ECLA

PROGRAMME MADE UP OF SUPERIOR LIGHT MUSI

Mr. Urack in Control — Som Thoughts on Conductors an Audiences—To Unbend Is Good

By S. C. Williams.

With the sure things,—Death and Taxes, many are now inclined to class Female Suffrage. And Bostonians have learned to regard as pleasantly inevitable the Pops. The 29th season opened, last night, in Symphony Hall, and opened as usual with rain. And the usual crowd was present, with a familiar programme of superior light music by the finest orchestra playing in a beer garden in any city of the world.

Mr. Otto Urack, who will conduct for the first three weeks of the season, had composed for the occasion a march styled the "Imperator Julien." Being sonorous and sound, with liberal use of the organ, it was roundly applauded. Other numbers were Thomas' Overture from "Mignon," the "Beautiful Blue Danube," Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, ballet music from "Gioconda," Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody," and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," ever popular, with Mr. Hoffman in the solo for violin, Mr. Marshall at the organ, and Mr. Holy in the harp part.

It has been agreeable to note with passing years a gradual unbending on the part of Pop conductors and audiences. Time was when beer was taken like communion wine, and an enthusiast demonstrating with his feet was made to feel like a wretch caught in kicking his grandmother's tomb. That is past now. The urbane "Sun" no longer twinkles over these concerts as over an excursion of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, viewing the two as extremes of Boston sportiveness. True, it is still considered ill bred to mention drink to a waiter during the "Ave Maria," but during a waltz or an overture one may chat as freely as at the opera. To unbend is good. There is no acreage of starched shirt-front in Bohemia.

TRANSCRIPT

MAY 5, 1914

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB POP CONCERT

Every Seat in Symphony Hall Taken and Large Membership Gains Announced

Not only was every seat taken in Symphony Hall, last evening, at a concert arranged to benefit the Women's City Club, but every one there was enthusiastic for the organization and the possibility of a new clubhouse at 40 Beacon street. Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, chairman of the committee which arranged the successful affair; Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, who started the club, and Miss Frances G. Curtis, who has worked for the clubhouse, were given bouquets of roses by Miss Mabel B. Ury, representing the executive board, in appreciation of their efforts. A telegram was sent Mrs. James J. Storrow, who has been chairman of the committee ever since the inception of this idea which has attracted a membership drawing near to 3000.

Mrs. Alice H. Grady announced the result of the all-day election as follows:

Secretary—Miss Flora MacDonald.

Treasurer—Mrs. Caroline Saunders.

Executive Committee—Serving until 1915: Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A. Burditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Alice C. Godin, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Alice H. Grady, Mrs. William H. Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Murray, Miss Maud M. Rockwell, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman. Until 1916: Mrs. Emily M. Beal, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Miss Katherine B. Child, Miss Mary Gillespie, Mrs. Clara T. Guild, Mrs. Katherine T. Hodges, Mrs. Louis E. Kirstein, Miss Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mrs. Katherine Osborne, Mrs. George W. Perkins. Until 1917: Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mary C. Crawford, Dr. Blanche A. Denig, Mrs. Glendower Evans, Mrs. W. H. Foster, Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs. J. F. McElwain, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Mrs. Walter Wesselhoeft, Mrs. A. L. Winship.

Nominating Committee — Miss S. J. Buttrick (chairman), Mrs. Julius Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster, Miss A. Florence Grant, Mrs. E. B. Gulliver, Miss Hortense W. Lewis, Miss Minnie E. Noyes, Mrs. C. J. Prescott, Dr. E. T. Ransom, Mrs. Charles Zueblin.

Otto Urack conducted and the audience enjoyed a delightful programme of music. Among those who had reservations at the tables were: Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Louis D. Brandeis, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Mrs. Robert S. Russell and Mrs. A. L. Winship.

JOURNAL— MAY 5, 1914.

Women's City Club Holds Pop Concer

Brilliant Gathering in Symphony Hall Celebrates C of First Successful Season of Boston Organization—Committee Members Re-elected.

With a large and brilliant pop concert at Symphony Hall, the Women's City Club brought to a close its first successful season last night. It was the first time that a women's club had engaged the hall for one of the concerts, and every seat, from the floor to the last rows in the galleries, was taken.

Miss Alice H. Grady was in charge, taking the place of the president, Mrs. James J. Storrow. The annual business meeting was to come before the concert, but the members voted to have the reports printed and sent to them. Miss Grady announced, however, the officers of the executive committee who had been elected during the day. These were practically the same as those who had served during the preceding year. Miss Flora MacDonald remains secretary, Mrs. Caroline Saunders, treasurer, and the nominating committee consists of Miss S. J. Buttrick, Mrs. Julius Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster, Mrs. E. B. Gulliver, Miss Hortense Lewis, Mrs. Charles Zueblin, Dr. E. T. Ransom, Mrs. C. J. Prescott, Miss Minnie E. Noyes and Miss A. Florence Grant.

Besides these are the thirty-three o members of the committee, who also main unchanged.

One of the features of the con
was the presentation of bouquets pink roses to Miss J. A. Bruorton, organized the club; Miss Frances tis, who did much of the work f
new clubhouse, and Mrs. F.
Goodwin, who organized the po
cert.

Among those present were M
Mrs. George Coleman, Mr. a
William Foster, Mr. and Mrs. B
Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. James L
Helen Hunt, Mrs. Frank Dunn, Du
Dunn, Miss Alice Dunn, Mr. and
Bernard J. Rothwell, Mr. and Edmund Billings, Mrs. George
Gallup, Mr. and Mrs. David Og
Mrs. Fred G. Hurd, Miss Grace Mi
Mrs. A. L. Filene, Miss Mary Crawf
Mrs. A. L. Winship, Mrs. Myra
Lord and Miss Maud Rockwell.

Although the club held its first organized meeting last June, it now reports that it numbers about 2530. It also reports that it has bought a clubhouse at 40 Beacon street, and will occupy it in the autumn.

BOSTON POST,

MAY 5, 1914

BRILLIANT POPS NIGHT BY WOME

Fill Symphony H and Conduct Election Too

Last night for the first time a woman's club, the Women's City Club, took over Symphony Hall for a pop concert and the evening was a brilliant success. There were plenty of men distributed among the 2530 members, and those on the floor wore full dress.

BUSINESS MEETING HELD

As the gathering was the first annual business meeting of the club, announcements were made of the election of officers, and a vote taken to send Mrs. James J. Storrow, who is retained as chairman, a greeting. A surprise came when Miss J. A. Bruorton was presented a bouquet of pink roses with the inscription: "To the one who made the Women's City Club possible."

Miss Frances Curtis was presented white roses for "The one who made the club-house possible," and Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin red roses for "The one who made the Pops Concert possible."

Mrs. Goodwin has given most of her time for the past month to making the concert a success. The sale of tickets was conducted by the club at the club office, 3 Hamilton place, and all the tables, and all of the seats save a few of the 25-cent ones were reserved there by members, these few being placed on sale to the general public at the box office in the evening.

For this first election a ballot was chosen by a membership committee. The polls were open from 8 in the morning till 7:30 at night, practically all voting the straight ticket, though it was possible to scratch out any name and write in a substitute. Mrs. George W. Coleman was chairman of the election committee.

The following were elected: Secretary, Miss Flora MacDonald; treasurer, Mrs. Caroline Saunders; executive committee, Miss Flora MacDonald and Mrs. Caroline Saunders, ex-officio, Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A. Burditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Alice C. Godin, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Alice H. Grady, Mrs. William H. Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Murray, Miss Maud M. Rockwell, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs. Emily M. Beal, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Miss Katherine B. Child, Miss Mabel Gillespie, Mrs. Clara T. Guild, Mrs. Katherine T. Hodges, Mrs Louis E. Kirstein, Miss Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mrs. Katherine Osborne, Mrs. George W. Perkins, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mary C. Crawford, Dr. Blanche A. Denig, Mrs. Glendower Evans, Mrs. W. H. Foster, Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs. J.
McElwain, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Mrs. W
ter Wesselhoeft and Mrs. A. L. Winsh

The house at 40 Beacon street, wh is to be the home of the club, is a story house with 52 feet on Bea street and an ell running back 65 towards Chestnut street and a gar 29 by 66 feet. It has been decided raise the roof on the rear so as to low for eight bed rooms. One l room on each floor will be used f dressing room, while the first floor also contain a men's dressing r
There will be three dining rooms.
The membership is now 2530
there's $13,000 in the treasury.

GL

MAY 5, 1

WOMEN'S CITY GIVES POP CO

Gifts to the Member Helped Organizat

Presidency Held Open in H Mrs Storrow Will Se

All seats in both balconies a those at the scores of decorat were occupied at the Pop con evening in Symphony Hall giv the auspices of the Women's C of Boston. Besides being the c public entertainment, it was a informal opening of the Pops for the orchestra of 66 pieces ducted by Otto Urack himself typical Pops program was fur Among those who entertaine parties were Mrs Alice G. Cra
Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs
L. Winship, Mrs George W. C
Mrs Edward A. Filene, Mrs Wi
Foster, Mrs Charles Zueblin, Mi
Crawford, Miss E. Louise Hallo
Margaret Foley, Miss Alice H.
Miss Josephine A. Bruorton a
Myra B. Lord.

Miss Mabel B. Ury, represent executive committee, presente quets to Miss Bruorton with scription "The one who made th en's City Club possible"; to Mis ces G. Curtis, "The one who m clubhouse possible," and to Mr
A. Goodwin, "The one who ma
pop concert possible."

The names of officers chosen afternoon election in room 408, ilton pl, were read. It was ann that a president and vice preside not be chosen until the club en quarters at 40 Beacon st. This was adopted out of deference James J. Storrow, chairman of th inal executive committee, who ma sent to her election to the first o

The new officers are: Miss Flo
Donald, secretary; Miss Caroline
ders, treasurer, both ex officio.
new executive committee were e
Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A
ditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss
G. Godin, Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin
Alice H. Grady, Mrs William
Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. M
Miss Maud Rockwell, Mrs May
Ward, Mrs Mary Schenck Wo
these terms to expire in 1915; Mrs
M. Beal, Mrs Edmund Billings,
Katherine B. Child, Miss Mabel Gi
Mrs Clara T. Guild, Mrs Kather
Hodges, Mrs Louis E. Kirstein,
Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. M
Mrs Katherine Osborne, Mrs G
W. Perkins, terms to expire in Mrs Charles Sumner Bird, Mis
sephine A. Bruorton, Miss Ma
Crawford, Dr Blanche Denig, Mrs
dower Evans, Mrs W. H. Foster,
Bertha Hazard, Mrs J. F. McE
Mrs J. J. Storrow, Mrs Walter
selhoeft, Mrs A. L. Winship, to expire in 1917.

On the nominating committee are
S. J. Buttrick, chairman; Mrs
Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster,
A. Florence Grant, Mrs E. B. Gu
Miss Hortense W. Lewis, Miss Ma
Noyes, Mrs C. J. Prescott, Dr
Ransom and Mrs Charles Zueblin.

TIGHT BINDING

RECORD.

MAY 6 1914

CROWD AT POPS OPENING

With the sure things,—Death and Taxes, many are now inclined to class Female Suffrage. And Bostonians have learned to regard as pleasantly inevitable the Pops. The 29th season opened, last night, in Symphony Hall, and opened as usual with rain. And the usual crowd was present, with a familiar programme of superior light music by the finest orchestra playing in a beer garden in any city of the world.

Mr. Otto Urack, who will conduct for the first three weeks of the season, had composed for the occasion a march styled the "Imperator Julien." Being sonorous and sound, with liberal use of the organ, it was roundly applauded. Other numbers were Thomas' Overture from "Mignon," the "Beautiful Blue Danube," Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, ballet music from "Gioconda," Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody," and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," ever popular, with Mr. Hoffman in the solo for violin, Mr. Marshall at the organ, and Mr. Holy in the harp part.

OTTO URACK,
The young Pops conductor, who played his own 'Imperator Julien.''

It has been agreeable to note with passing years a gradual unbending on the part of Pop conductors and audiences. Time was when beer was taken like communion wine, and an enthusiast demonstrating with his feet was made to feel like a wretch caught in kicking his grandmother's tomb. That is past now. The urbane "Sun" no longer twinkles over these concerts as over an excursion of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, viewing the two as extremes of Boston sportiveness. True, it is still considered ill bred to mention drink to a waiter during the "Ave Maria," but during a waltz or an overture one may chat as freely as at the opera. To unbend is good. There is no acreage of starched shirt-front in Bohemia.

TRAVELER

MAY 6, 1914.

POPS FOR 1914 GET FINE START

Crowded House on the Opening Night and Enthusiasm Runs High.

The Pops for 1914 got a flying start last evening in Symphony Hall with tables all taken, both balconies filled and a program that will challenge the best of the season. Otto Urack was at the conductor's desk, and so ably directed his sixty odd players that enthusiasm ran high throughout the evening.

The first number, the conductor's "Imperator Julian" march, hit the popular fancy., Mr. Urack was compelled to repeatedly acknowledge the applause of the house. From then on it was simply a case of one good thing after another, with those selections that made a particularly good impression being followed by insistent demands for an encore. These, as is the custom at the Pops, were readily granted. One extra number, Handel's "Largo," fairly swept the audience off its feet. It was exceptionally well given even for the Pops, and was followed by enthusiastic outbursts that would not be satisfied until Mr. Hoffmann, concert master; Mr. Holly, harpist, and Mr. Marshall at the organ had risen times without count to receive the approval of the house.

Such an audience on such a night can leave little doubt as to the success of the season. Tonight's program will be:

March, "Manhattan Beach"..........Sousa
Overture, "Light Cavalry"..........Suppe
Melody..........................Rubinstein
(Arr. by D'Indy).
Suite from "Louise"..........Charpentier
Overture, "Der Freischnetz"..........Weber
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna"..........Wolf-Ferrari
Violin Solo, "Rondo Capriccioso".....Saint-Saens
(Mr. Hoffmann).
Waltz, "Rathausballtaenze"..........Strauss
Overture, "1812"..........Tschaikowsky
(Organ, Mr. Marshall).
Intermezzo, "Midsummer"..........Maquarre
Selection, "The Little Cafe"..........Caryll
March, "Wien bleibt Wien"....Schrammel

BOSTON POST,

MAY 6, 1914

BIG CROWD AT OPENING OF "POPS"

Large Orchestra Inaugurates 29th Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

In spite of the rain, the biggest audience which has gathered for any opening of a Pop concert season was in evidence last night in Symphony Hall. The hall was sold out. The patronage of these concerts has increased rapidly in late seasons, but it is seldom that an opening has been so well attended. "Opening" it was, in spite of the concert given on Monday night for the Women's City Club and their guests. Last night the doors were thrown open for the first time in the 29th season of these concerts to the general public, and the general public assembled in large numbers and showed its satisfaction.

URACK'S MARCH PLAYED

The attendance aside, the opening, musically speaking, was uncommonly brilliant. Mr. Urack's new march, "Imperator Julian," which inaugurated the programme, met with a deserved success. It is a march for such an occasion, scored for a big modern orchestra, with organ, and it is effective in a manner that reminds one of the scoring of Strauss' "Festival Prelude" played at one of the Symphony concerts earlier in the spring.

Nearly all of the performances were exceptionally spirited and finished. Needless to say, a Pop concert is not given the extended rehearsals necessary for a big programme of serious music, such as is heard at the subscription series of Symphony concerts in the winter; but the clearness and rhythmic cleanness, the phrasing and the shading in the performance of Thomas' "Mignon" overture would have given pleasure under any circumstances.

Other compositions on the programme were Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, the ballet music from "La Gioconda," Chabrier's "Espana"—one of the wittiest pieces of music in experience; Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" No. 2, the Handel "Largo," with organ, which was played as an encore; the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria, in which Jacques Hoffmann played the violin solo, and other music by Leoncavallo, Schubert, Waldteufel and Sousa. John P. Marshall, organist of the orchestra, took the organ parts.

As has become more and more customary of late, the music was listened to in silence and with respectful attention. It used not to be so, nor is a Pop concert supposed to be a solemn ceremonial. There are liquids and ices. Conversation need not concern itself with discussion of the later orchestral works of Johannes Brahms.

A conductor need not demand that his audience suspend all operations to watch his baton. One can amuse himself, even at a concert in Boston. On the other hand, the fact that the audiences which now gather for these Pop concerts do so far more for the sake of the music than for the purpose of chatting away an idle hour and the quality and quantity of the applause testify to the hold the concerts now have on the public and bear witness to their value as well as their entertaining character. It is hardly necessary to say that there was much enthusiastic recognition of the performances of the evening, and, as usual, a considerable number of encores were added to the programme as announced.

ADVERTISER.

MAY 6, 1914

THE "POPS" OPEN WITH USUAL ECLAT

PROGRAMME MADE UP OF SUPERIOR LIGHT MUSIC

Mr. Urack in Control — Some Thoughts on Conductors and Audiences—To Unbend Is Good.

By S. C. Williams.

With the sure things,—Death and Taxes, many are now inclined to class Female Suffrage. And Bostonians have learned to regard as pleasantly inevitable the Pops. The 29th season opened, last night, in Symphony Hall, and opened as usual with rain. And the usual crowd was present, with a familiar programme of superior light music by the finest orchestra playing in a beer garden in any city of the world.

Mr. Otto Urack, who will conduct for the first three weeks of the season, had composed for the occasion a march styled the "Imperator Julien." Being sonorous and sound, with liberal use of the organ, it was roundly applauded. Other numbers were Thomas' Overture from "Mignon," the "Beautiful Blue Danube," Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody, ballet music from "Gioconda," Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody," and the Bach-Gounod "Meditation," ever popular, with Mr. Hoffman in the solo for violin, Mr. Marshall at the organ, and Mr. Holy in the harp part.

It has been agreeable to note with passing years a gradual unbending on the part of Pop conductors and audiences. Time was when beer was taken like communion wine, and an enthusiast demonstrating with his feet was made to feel like a wretch caught in kicking his grandmother's tomb. That is past now. The urbane "Sun" no longer twinkles over these concerts as over an excursion of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, viewing the two as extremes of Boston sportiveness. True, it is still considered ill bred to mention drink to a waiter during the "Ave Maria," but during a waltz or an overture one may chat as freely as at the opera. To unbend is good. There is no acreage of starched shirt-front in Bohemia.

TRANSCRIPT

MAY 5, 1914

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB POP CONCERT

Every Seat in Symphony Hall Taken and Large Membership Gains Announced

Not only was every seat taken in Symphony Hall, last evening, at a concert arranged to benefit the Women's City Club, but every one there was enthusiastic for the organization and the possibility of a new clubhouse at 40 Beacon street. Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, chairman of the committee which arranged the successful affair; Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, who started the club, and Miss Frances G. Curtis, who has worked for the clubhouse, were given bouquets of roses by Miss Mabel B. Ury, representing the executive board, in appreciation of their efforts. A telegram was sent Mrs. James J. Storrow, who has been chairman of the committee ever since the inception of this idea which has attracted a membership drawing near to 3000.

Mrs. Alice H. Grady announced the result of the all-day election as follows:

Secretary—Miss Flora MacDonald.

Treasurer—Mrs. Caroline Saunders.

Executive Committee—Serving until 1915: Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A. Burditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Alice C. Godin, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Alice H. Grady, Mrs. William H. Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Murray, Miss Maud M. Rockwell, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman. Until 1916: Mrs. Emily M. Beal, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Miss Katherine B. Child, Miss Mary Gillespie, Mrs. Clara T. Guild, Mrs. Katherine T. Hodges, Mrs. Louis E. Kirstein, Miss Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mrs. Katherine Osborne, Mrs. George W. Perkins. Until 1917: Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mary C. Crawford, Dr. Blanche A. Denig, Mrs. Glendower Evans, Mrs. W. H. Foster, Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs. J. F. McElwain, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Mrs. Walter Wesselhoeft, Mrs. A. L. Winship.

Nominating Committee — Miss S. J. Buttrick (chairman), Mrs. Julius Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster, Miss A. Florence Grant, Mrs. E. B. Gulliver, Miss Hortense W. Lewis, Miss Minnie E. Noyes, Mrs. C. J. Prescott, Dr. E. T. Ransom, Mrs. Charles Zueblin.

Otto Urack conducted and the audience enjoyed a delightful programme of music. Among those who had reservations at the tables were: Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Louis D. Brandeis, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Mrs. Robert S. Russell and Mrs. A. L. Winship.

JOURNAL-

MAY 5, 1914.

en's City Club Holds Pop Concer t Gathering in Symphony Hall Celebrates C First Successful Season of Boston Organization—Committee Members Re-elected.

a large and brilliant pop concert phony Hall, the Women's City Club brought to a close its first successful season last night. It was the first time that a women's club had engaged the hall for one of the concerts, and every seat, from the floor to the last rows in the galleries, was taken.

Miss Alice H. Grady was in charge, taking the place of the president, Mrs. James J. Storrow. The annual business meeting was to come before the concert, but the members voted to have the reports printed and sent to them. Miss Grady announced, however, the officers of the executive committee who had been elected during the day. These were practically the same as those who had served during the preceding year. Miss Flora MacDonald remains secretary, Mrs. Caroline Saunders, treasurer, and the nominating committee consists of Miss S. J. Buttrick, Mrs. Julius Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster, Mrs. E. B. Gulliver, Miss Hortense Lewis, Mrs. Charles Zueblin, Dr. E. T. Ransom, Mrs. C. J. Prescott, Miss Minnie E. Noyes and Miss A. Florence Grant.

Besides these are the thirty-three o members of the committee, who als
main unchanged.

One of the features of the con was the presentation of bouquet pink roses to Miss J. A. Bruorton, organized the club; Miss Frances tis, who did much of the work
new clubhouse, and Mrs. F.
Goodwin, who organized the p
cert.

Among those present were
Mrs. George Coleman, Mr. a
William Foster, Mr. and Mrs.
Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. James
Helen Hunt, Mrs. Frank D
Dunn, Miss Alice Dunn, r. and Bernard J. Rothwell, r. and Edmund Billings, Mr George
Gallup, Mr. and Mrs. David O
Mrs. Fred G. Hurd, M s Grace M
Mrs. A. L. Filene, Mis Mary Craw
Mrs. A. L. Winship Mrs. My
Lord and Miss Maud Rockwell.

Although the club held its fir
ganized meeting la June, it n
ports that it num ers about 25
also reports that has bought house at 40 Bea n street, an occupy it in the tumn.

BOSTON POST,

MAY 5, 1914

BRILLIANT POPS NIGHT BY WOMEN

Fill Symphony Hall and Conduct Election Too

Last night for the first time a woman's club, the Women's City Club, took over Symphony Hall for a pop concert and the evening was a brilliant success. There were plenty of men distributed among the 2530 members, and those on the floor wore full dress.

BUSINESS MEETING HELD

As the gathering was the first annual business meeting of the club, announcements were made of the election of officers, and a vote taken to send Mrs. James J. Storrow, who is retained as chairman, a greeting. A surprise came when Miss J. A. Bruorton was presented a bouquet of pink roses with the inscription: "To the one who made the Women's City Club possible."

Miss Frances Curtis was presented white roses for "The one who made the club-house possible," and Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin red roses for "The one who made the Pops Concert possible."

Mrs. Goodwin has given most of her time for the past month to making the concert a success. The sale of tickets was conducted by the club at the club office, 3 Hamilton place, and all the tables, and all of the seats save a few of the 25-cent ones were reserved there by members, these few being placed on sale to the general public at the box office in the evening.

For this first election a ballot was chosen by a membership committee. The polls were open from 8 in the morning till 7:30 at night, practically all voting the straight ticket, though it was possible to scratch out any name and write in a substitute. Mrs. George W. Coleman was chairman of the election committee.

The following were elected: Secretary, Miss Flora MacDonald; treasurer, Mrs. Caroline Saunders; executive committee, Miss Flora MacDonald and Mrs. Caroline Saunders, ex-officio, Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A. Burditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Alice C. Godin, Mrs. F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Alice H. Grady, Mrs. William H. Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Murray, Miss Maud M. Rockwell, Mrs. May Alden Ward, Mrs. Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs. Emily M. Beal, Mrs. Edmund Billings, Miss Katherine B. Child, Miss Mabel Gillespie, Mrs. Clara T. Guild, Mrs. Katherine T. Hodges, Mrs Louis E. Kirstein, Miss Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mrs. Katherine Osborne, Mrs. George W. Perkins, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mary C. Crawford, Dr. Blanche A. Denig, Mrs. Glendower Evans, Mrs. W. H. Fos

Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs. J.
'lwain, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Mrs. W Wesselhoeft and Mrs. A. L. Wins house at 40 Beacon street, wh be the home of the club, is house with 52 feet on Bea end an ell running back 6
Chestnut street and a gar feet. It has been decided roof on the rear so as to eight bed rooms. One ch floor will be used f m, while the first floor
a men's dressing r
three dining rooms.
ship is now 2530
in the treasury.

WOMEN'S GIVES PO

Gifts to the Mem Helped Orga

Presidency Held Open
Mrs Storrow Will

All seats in both balconi
those at the scores of dec were occupied at the Pop evening in Symphony Hall the auspices of the Women of Boston. Besides being the public entertainment, it was informal opening of the Po
for the orchestra of 66 pieces
ducted by Otto Urack himself typical Pops program was fu
Among those who entertain parties were Mrs Alice G. Cr
Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs
L. Winship, Mrs George W. C
Mrs Edward A. Filene, Mrs Wil
Foster, Mrs Charles Zueblin, Mis
Crawford, Miss E. Louise Halloc
Margaret Foley, Miss Alice H.
Miss Josephine A. Bruorton an
Myra B. Lord.
Miss Mabel B. Ury, representi executive committee, presented quets to Miss Bruorton with t scription "The one who made the en's City Club possible"; to Miss ces G. Curtis, "The one who ma clubhouse possible," and to Mrs
A. Goodwin, "The one who mad
pop concert possible."
The names of officers chosen afternoon election in room 408, 3 ilton pl, were read. It was anno that a president and vice presider not be chosen until the club ente quarters at 40 Beacon st. This was adopted out of deference t James J. Storrow, chairman of the inal executive committee, who ma sent to her election to the first off
The new officers are: Miss Flor
Donald, secretary; Miss Caroline
ders, treasurer, both ex officio.
new executive committee were el
Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A.
ditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss
G. Godin, Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin,
Alice H. Grady, Mrs William
Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Mu
Miss Maud Rockwell, Mrs May
Ward, Mrs Mary Schenck Woo
these terms to expire in 1915; Mrs
M. Beal, Mrs Edmund Billings,
Katherine B. Child, Miss Mabel Gill
Mrs Clara T. Guild, Mrs Katheri
Hodges, Mrs Louis E. Kirstein,
Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. M
Mrs Katherine Osborne, Mrs G
W. Perkins, terms to expire in Mrs Charles Sumner Bird, Miss sephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mar
Crawford, Dr Blanche Denig, Mrs
dower Evans, Mrs W. H. Foster,
Bertha Hazard, Mrs J. F. McEl
Mrs J. J. Storrow, Mrs Walter
selhoeft, Mrs A. L. Winship,
to expire in 1917.
On the nominating committee are
S. J. Buttrick, chairman; Mrs J
Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster,
A. Florence Grant, Mrs E. B. Gul
Miss Hortense W. Lewis, Miss Mar
Noyes, Mrs C. J. Prescott, Dr E
Ransom and Mrs Charles Zueblin.

MAY 5. 1914

ty Club op Concert

hony Hall Celebrates Close n of Boston Organiza-mbers Re-elected.

Besides these are the thirty-three o
members of the committee, who also
main unchanged.
One of the features of the con
was the presentation of bouquets
pink roses to Miss J. A. Bruorton, organized the club; Miss Frances tis, who did much of the work for new clubhouse, and Mrs. F. E.
Goodwin, who organized the pop
cert.
Among those present were Mr
Mrs. George Coleman, Mr. and
William Foster, Mr. and Mrs.
Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. James Lo
Helen Hunt, Mrs. Frank Dunn,
Dunn, Miss Alice Dunn, Mr. and
Bernard J. Rothwell, Mr. and Edmund Billings, Mrs. Georg
Gallup, Mr. and Mrs. David
Mrs. Fred G. Hurd, Miss Grace
Mrs. A. L. Filene, Miss Mary Cra Mrs. A. L. Winshi Mrs. My Lord and Miss Mau Rockwell.
Although the clu held its fir
ganized meeting la June, it n
ports that it num ers about 2
also reports that has bought house at 40 Bea n street, an occupy it in the tumn.

5, 1914

te Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs. J
M Elwain, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Mrs.
te Wesselhoeft and Mrs. A. L. Win
T e house at 40 Beacon street, is be the home of the club, is sto house with 52 feet on B stre and an ell running back 6
towa ds Chestnut street and a g
29 by 66 feet. It has been decid raise the roof on the rear so as low for eight bed rooms. One room n each floor will be used dressin room, while the first floo also c ntain a men's dressing
There ill be three dining room
The membership is now 253
there's 13,000 in the treasury.

BOSTON GLOBE

MAY 5, 1914.

WOMEN'S CITY CLUB GIVES POP CONCERT

Gifts to the Members Who Helped Organization.

Presidency Held Open in Hope That Mrs Storrow Will Serve.

All seats in both balconies as well as those at the scores of decorated tables were occupied at the Pop concert last evening in Symphony Hall given under the auspices of the Women's City Club of Boston. Besides being the club's first public entertainment, it was a sort of informal opening of the Pops season, for the orchestra of 66 pieces was conducted by Otto Urack himself, and a typical Pops program was furnished.

Among those who entertained table parties were Mrs Alice G. Cram, Mrs Mary Schenck Woolman, Mrs Addison L. Winship, Mrs George W. Coleman, Mrs Edward A. Filene, Mrs William H. Foster, Mrs Charles Zueblin, Miss M. C. Crawford, Miss E. Louise Hallock, Miss Margaret Foley, Miss Alice H. Grady, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton and Mrs Myra B. Lord.

Miss Mabel B. Ury, representing the executive committee, presented bouquets to Miss Bruorton with the inscription "The one who made the Women's City Club possible"; to Miss Frances G. Curtis, "The one who made the clubhouse possible," and to Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin, "The one who made the pop concert possible."

The names of officers chosen at the afternoon election in room 408, 3 Hamilton pl, were read. It was announced that a president and vice president will not be chosen until the club enters its quarters at 40 Beacon st. This policy was adopted out of deference to Mrs James J. Storrow, chairman of the original executive committee, who may consent to her election to the first office.

The new officers are: Miss Flora McDonald, secretary; Miss Caroline Saunders, treasurer, both ex officio. To the new executive committee were elected: Miss S. M. Borden, Miss Alice A. Burditt, Miss Frances G. Curtis, Miss Alice G. Godin, Mrs F. E. A. Goodwin, Miss Alice H. Grady, Mrs William H. Lothrop, Miss Margaret E. Murray, Miss Maud Rockwell, Mrs May Alden Ward, Mrs Mary Schenck Woolman, these terms to expire in 1915; Mrs Emily M. Beal, Mrs Edmund Billings, Miss Katherine B. Child, Miss Mabel Gillespie, Mrs Clara T. Guild, Mrs Katherine T. Hodges, Mrs Louis E. Kirstein, Miss Mary H. Ladd, Miss Mary C. Mellyn, Mrs Katherine Osborne, Mrs George W. Perkins, terms to expire in 1916; Mrs Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Josephine A. Bruorton, Miss Mary C. Crawford, Dr Blanche Denig, Mrs Glendower Evans, Mrs W. H. Foster, Miss Bertha Hazard, Mrs J. F. McElwain, Mrs J. J. Storrow, Mrs Walter Wesselhoeft, Mrs A. L. Winship, terms to expire in 1917.

On the nominating committee are Miss S. J. Buttrick, chairman; Mrs Julius Andrews, Miss Harriet W. Foster, Miss A. Florence Grant, Mrs E. B. Gulliver, Miss Hortense W. Lewis, Miss Mary E. Noyes, Mrs C. J. Prescott, Dr E. T. Ransom and Mrs Charles Zueblin.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND